Merthyr Tydfil.—Flower services were held in the Unitarian Chapel last Sunday, June 25, and were well attended morning, afternoon, and evening. The chapel was beautifully decorated with flowers, plants, &c. In the afternoon a special flower service, published by the Sunday School Association, was rendered by the choir. Appropriate sermons were delivered by the minister.

Moretonhampstead.—Our church has lost another of its old members. Mrs. Barter, the last of several sisters, has rejoined the family circle in the world to come. She always delighted to be in her place at the chapel services, when strength permitted. She suffered much in the last few years, but was cheerful to the end. She is much missed.

Walsley.—Last Sunday the "sermons" were preached afternoon and evening by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., of Bristol, and the "scholars'" service in the morning was conducted by Rev. E. Allen. There were very large congregations, and the collections with donations amounted to £65 5s. 0d.

West of England Divines.—The 244th Assembly of West of England Divines met at George's Meeting, Exeter, on Wednesday, June 21. A paper on the "History of the Assembly" was read by the Rev. Priestley Prime, of Heaton Moor, Manchester. Mr. Prime was appointed last year to make researches in the Archives of the Assembly. The original Assembly was founded in 1665. For thirty years after the Restoration no meetings were held. At the business meeting grants were made to ministers, the Rev. John Barron was elected Moderator, and the Rev. E. H. Ballard, Scribe for the ensuing year. The Assembly adjourned to the Royal Clarence Hotel for lunch. The Rev. T. L. Marshall was present as guest of the Assembly, and welcome was given to two new members, the Rev. W. Agar, and Rev. A. E. O'Connor, B.D.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. Robinson, £5 5s.; Mr. John Quintrell, 10s.

STAND where God has placed you—make, from day to day, a garden of the Lord of whatever wilderness lies around your own contracted steps on earth—do what your hand findeth to do—cherish whatever may sweeten and cheer the hearts that are nearest to you—entertain, though you can do nothing for it but give it a hospitable lodging in your soul, every project of spirit that the Holy Spirit prompts, and the kingdom which cometh not with observation, is advancing upon you as rapidly as God, who knows you, sees to be safe, as rapidly as is consistent with spiritual foundations with a solid framework, and imperishable gains of growth.—John Hamilton Thom.

THERE is no action so slight nor so mean but it may be done to a great purpose, and ennobled therefore; nor is any purpose so great but that slight actions may help it, and may be so done as to help it much, most especially that chief of all purposes—the pleasing of God.—Ruskin.

LYDGATE CHAPEL.

URGENT APPEAL.

The Congregation desire to announce that there is a pressing need of repairs and alterations in the Chapel and Parsonage. In order to carry out everything completely £300 is required.

A BAZAAR will be held at Lydgate on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, JULY 6th, 7th, and 8th, in aid of this object, to be opened by J. S. MATHERS, Esq., J.P., of Leeds.

By a Resolution passed on April 25th the Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union "commend the scheme to the generous support of the Unitarian public."

Contributions will be thankfully acknowledged by Mr. W. HEeley, Sycamore, New Mill, Huddersfield, or by the Rev. J. H. GREEN, Minister, Lydgate, New Mill, Huddersfield.

MATTHEW HENRY'S CHAPEL, CHESTER.

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION FUND.

The roof and ceiling of the Ancient Chapel (1700) are now dangerous. The architects recommend entirely new ones. Much dilapidated in other respects, renovation is urgently needed. The cost of these restorations will be £750, or more. Towards this sum the congregation and trustees, with some old members and friends, have subscribed £320, which may be increased. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has given £50.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE reception given to Mr. and Mrs. Booker T. Washington, at Essex Hall on Monday, by Dr. and Mrs. Brooke Hereford, was largely attended, among those present being the American Ambassador, the Hon. J. H. Choate, the Right Hon. James Bryce, M.P., Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Mr. S. J. Barrows (member of Congress), and formerly editor of the Christian Register, Mr. Murray Macdonald and Mr. Hodgson Pratt. Letters of regret for absence were received from the Revs. Dr. Clifford, Dr. Parker and Hugh Price Hughes. Nearly all of our London ministers were present. After the reception a public meeting was held, at which the Hon. J. H. Choate took the chair, and in introducing Mr. Washington, said that when freedom came he did not know what his name was, so took the best there was, and he had never discredited that great name. At his school at Tuskegee, Alabama—the Normal and Industrial Coloured School—they taught not only rudimentary education, but also the means of getting a livelihood. There were now 1,100 pupils in that school; half went out to teach their own race, and half to support themselves by manual trades. Government had given them 25,000 acres of land in Alabama; the State gave them an annual donation; grants were also made from the Peabody and Slater Funds, and there were also voluntary contributions. I regard him, said Mr. Choate, as the leader of his race in America.

MR. BOOKER WASHINGTON, in the course of an eloquent address on "The Condition and Prospects of the Coloured Race in America," said that there were eight millions of negroes in the South—a nation within a nation. There was only one way of settling the problem thus raised; it was God's way. It was by the black man trying to live as a Christian gentleman, and the white man trying to treat the black man as a Christian gentleman. Slavery had taught them how to work, but it had sapped their self-reliance. They did not know how to live, to spend money properly. They were too often in debt and living from hand to mouth. But they could be taught, led and guided, and that was what his teachers did. The address was lighted up with touches of humour, and concluded with words of confidence and hope. The Right Hon. James Bryce also spoke, and said that he agreed with Mr. Booker Washington as to the supreme importance of, basing the progress of the negro on industrial training. In spite of some terrible events in the South, yet the feeling between the two races was on the whole good. The mistake after the war was in beginning on the political rather than the industrial side. After speaking of the efforts of General Armstrong, Mr. Bryce rejoiced at the hopeful tone of Mr. Washington's address, and felt assured there was hope for the future: a beginning had been made in solving the problem.

It was with a sense of relief that we heard of the landing of Captain Dreyfus at Quiberon last Saturday. A heavy sea was running, and the special train which carried him to Rennes passed through a storm of rain. But there was an interval of brighter weather as he was driven to the military prison, where he awaits his second trial. The first meeting of Mme. Dreyfus and her husband has been variously described: that which pictured the stress of emotion as beyond the power of words we should expect to be nearest the truth. Captain Dreyfus is said to have benefited greatly from the voyage, and to be in good health of body and mind; but what can expiate the wrong he has suffered in four terrible years of imprisonment? The Special Correspondent of the Daily Chronicle telegraphed the following declaration he is said to have made:—

My condemnation and sentence were a symbol of anti-Jewish odium. My judges were involuntarily deceived. May my undeserved expiation put an end to racial or religious feuds in the army, and in that France which I have passionately loved and served.

The words may be apocryphal, but if so they are well invented, as uttered by one still in ignorance of what had taken place since his banishment, and they express a desire which all true lovers of France must earnestly hope may be fulfilled.

THE second reading of the Tithe-Rent-Charge Bill (a sop to Cerberus the Christian World calls it) was passed by a large majority, but not without strong opposition from influential supporters of the Government. A sum of £87,000 a year is to be given in relief of rates payable by the clergy, a fresh endowment of the Church by that amount. The feeling of Liberals towards the Bill is well expressed in the following resolution passed on Wednesday at a meeting of the Eastern Counties Liberal Federation at Cambridge:—

That this meeting emphatically protests against the passing into law of the Clerical Tithes Bill, first because it involves the violation of the principle of religious equality, and secondly because it is practically an additional endowment to be granted out of the public funds to that church in England which can best afford to supply any recognised deficiency in the income of its religious teachers.

The Church of England has yet to learn the meaning of self-help. Why not a Two Million Guinea Fund, Earl Spencer has asked, instead of looking to the State for relief of undoubted hardship to many of the clergy? The Wesleyans can raise their Million, and the Church of England, if it is to retain the respect of the people of this country, will have to prove the virtue and the strength of independence.

THE final session of the International Congress of Women was held on Wednesday, and five years hence the next meeting of the Congress is to be held in Berlin. The labours of the Congress have been exhaustive, the newspaper reports leaving an impression of multitudinous papers and discussions in the various sections, and all of real value, leaving no phase of women's work, and no social question affecting the welfare of women, untouched. Among many valuable practical suggestions was one for common residences for professional women obliged to live in town. At one of the final meetings of the Congress Miss L. Toulmin Smith, librarian of Manchester College, Oxford, gave an address on the openings for women in library work.

At the recent celebration of the Jubilee of the Bedford College for Women cordial testimony was borne from many sides to the value of the services it has rendered in promoting the higher education of women. Mrs. Henry Sidgwick, the Principal of Newnham, expressed her pleasure in attending the Jubilee of Bedford, "the eldest sister of this now numerous educational family." Miss Anna Swanwick, LL.D., presided at the first meeting, and Professor Jebb, M.P., at the public meeting in the theatre of the University of London. The Duke of Devonshire, the Dean of Durham, and Miss Maitland, Principal of Somerville, were among those who joined in the congratulations.

A STATUE of Tom Hughes was unveiled at Rugby a fortnight ago by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Spectator of the following week contained an article on "The influence of 'Tom Brown,'" from which the following passage is taken:—

He, more than any other man, made the modern schoolboy. The schoolboyishness which endured in him enabled him so to interpret the thoughts of Dr. Arnold—a much greater man, but something too much of the schoolmaster—that they caught the imagination, and thenceforward affected the conduct, of a whole generation of schoolboys, who, if the thoughts had not passed through the medium of Tom Hughes's schoolboy nature, might have rejected them with distaste. He took away from good counsel its flavour of priggishness, from piety its taint of sanctimoniousness, from the virtues their colouring of separateness and self-righteousness. He convinced schoolboys that it was possible to be manly, and truthful, and pure, and even religious, and yet remain healthy schoolboys still, with muscles in their frames longing for exercise, and ferment in their hearts, and vague aspirations in their brains, all leading to confused and over-rapid conduct. His boys, the boys he would have all boys be, were far removed from little men, were not too sensible, or too reflective, or too scholarly for the majority of boys to admire. They were just boys like other boys, who could play and quarrel and fight, and make friendships and enmities unreasonably, and neglect work, and even on occasion commit grave faults, but with this difference from their predecessors, that they held the manly virtues to be "good form," and each in his degree strove to found conduct on them. That was, in substance, the teaching of the whole school of "muscular Christians" to which Mr. Hughes always belonged, but he, and he alone, made it palatable, or indeed in favourable cases delightful, to average schoolboys, who before Dr. Arnold's and Tom Hughes's time had no rule to go by which they could heartily accept.

THE writer of the article went on to wonder whether any one would ever do for Board-schools what Hughes did for Rugby and its rivals. The need, it was said, was very great, especially in the schools of great cities, of a higher tone in the matter of foul language, lying and cheating.

It would be a great thing if even lying could be made to seem to Board-school boys a shameful form of cowardice, and gambling a dirty device of the clever for depriving the foolish of their coppers. Bad language certainly could be put down as vulgar, the slightest precept of caste, if once appreciated, being instantly obeyed. Perhaps some woman with a genius and unusual knowledge of the actual child heart will arise among us who can do the work, or rather—for that is the true path—so fascinate the children that they can be induced to do it for themselves. If she ever does arise, and succeeds as Hughes did, she will do more for good education than the hosts of devoted men who with so much benevolence and so little judgment continually press for a wider curriculum, forgetting that the boy who can really read as a public school boy reads, write easily and simply, and cipher as well as his sister does, is master already of the instruments for learning anything. It is tone, not knowledge, that we now want in Board-schools, and it was tone which Hughes with his breezy, humorous, easily read narrative imparted to the life of our public schools. He will be remembered, and rightly remembered, when a good many of his intellectual superiors have passed into the oblivion which is, fortunately, the destiny of 99 per cent. of us all.

IN the recently-published volume of Jowett's letters, the first section on Church Reform includes some most interesting passages from the evidence he gave in 1871 before the Select Committee of the House of Lords on University Tests. Jowett was for the abolition of all tests, even in connection with the Divinity professorships. Tests, he said, had not prevented great divergencies of opinion springing up, and if they were abolished he did not think the divergencies would be greater. Even the most comprehensive test would exclude some, and there was ambiguity as to its meaning.

Supposing we require as a condition of becoming a teacher a declaration of the general faith of a Christian, still an ambiguity arises. There is a difference of opinion amongst persons as to who are to be called Christians, and who are to be included. We are apt to speak of everybody as an infidel who does not agree with us, and we should have the old disputes revived. Is a Quaker or is a Unitarian a Christian? Then, again, the Jew, or freethinker, would be excluded, the Ultramontane admitted. Let me also put the case of particular scientific men who are not at all opposed to Christianity, but yet who might have a great objection to signing such a test, both on general grounds, which would apply to signing any test whatever, and on particular grounds with reference to the sense in which the word "Christian" was employed. It is a very invidious thing to compel a conscientious man to say, "I am not a Christian, and I object to signing that test?" I think you would find difficulties about a comprehensive test. It goes upon the supposition that the Universities are divided into two great classes, one consisting of Christians and the other of infidels. That is not at all really the case. We shade off into one another, just as people do in society, by every degree of difference, and sometimes pass from one class to the other, and you would do harm if you introduced artificial distinctions which stereotyped us as Christians or non-Christians, just as you would if you introduced similar distinctions in society.

As to divinity professors, Jowett thought that tests were ill-adapted for guarding the teaching or securing desirable appointments. Tests, he said, would be as useless and superfluous in their case as in others.

I should not bind a person by the obligation of a test. I should like to put before the Committee this consideration. Supposing you had one class of professors bound by tests; for instance, supposing the Church of England divinity professors were bound by tests and other divinity professors were not bound by tests, which do you suppose would have the greatest authority and weight—the persons who were free to speak what they thought, or the persons who were obliged to speak within a certain limit? Of the latter a great suspicion would arise that they said not what they thought, but what they were compelled by the test to say.

The reason for the great principle of Free Teaching and Free Learning in Theology maintained by Manchester College could hardly be more tersely put; but the Divinity Professorships in the University of Oxford are not yet freed from tests.

IN connection with the close of the session at Carmarthen College, the Principal received a letter of greeting from the Rev. T. L. Marshall, who has retired from the office of Visitor to the College, a post which he has held since 1853. Having referred to the cordial relations which had subsisted for so many years between him and both teachers and students in the College, Mr. Marshall added:—"I have long felt that the great principle and the spiritual affinities that unite us are far deeper and more precious than the dogmas that divide us into different sects, important as they undoubtedly are to various classes of minds. We are, after all, so many companies in the one Great Army of Christ. Whatever changes the good old College is destined to undergo, I earnestly hope that it will long continue to be, as heretofore, a sanctuary of sound learning and unfettered religious liberty, and will always keep its doors wide open to students of different denominations."

THE Rev. Thomas Van Ness, minister of the Second Church of Boston, U.S.A., who is at present on a visit to this country, is to preach at Richmond on Sunday morning, in the Ormond-road Free Church.

THE Rev. Stopford Wentworth Brooke has decided not to continue his ministry in San Francisco, much to the regret of the First Church, and will return, as we understand, to this country. He closed his ministry in the Far West on the last Sunday in June.

COMMUNICATIONS for the Rev. John Cuckson should be addressed to the care of the Rev. H. Austin, Cirencester. He is expected to arrive at Southampton on Monday next on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, along with the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, who is spending his summer holiday at home.

OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL.

THE Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers, held at Manchester College, Oxford, from June 30 to July 8, has more than fulfilled the hopes and expectations with which it was projected. The Sunday-School Association is to be congratulated on the success of an experiment, which we may trust is the beginning of a movement rich in promise for the future, and the warmest thanks are due to the Principal and Professors of Manchester College, for the cordial manner in which they have thrown themselves into the movement, to ensure its success; and also to the local hon. secretary, Mr. J. H. Woods, the senior student of the College, and to Mrs. Woods, who were indefatigable in their efforts to secure suitable accommodation for the visitors, and to see that all arrangements went smoothly. Not less than 140 teachers and superintendents from different parts of the country were present during the session, which was productive of much pleasant social intercourse, as well as of serious attention to the lectures provided.

The session opened on Friday morning, June 30, with an hour's service in the College chapel, conducted by the Principal, who read lessons from Isaiah xxxv. and 1 Cor. iii., and also gave an address on the essential spirit that must be in all Sunday-school work.

DR. DRUMMOND'S ADDRESS.

Taking as text the words from the second lesson, 1 Cor. iii. 9, "We are God's fellow-workers," Dr. Drummond said that there were two convictions from which they gained the motive for their work. The first was that there is Supreme Goodness ruling at the heart of the universe, and that communion with that Goodness is the highest end of man. That conviction had been growing in the human heart from early times, until it was announced by Jesus in all the splendour of its glory, and since then it had been rooting itself more and more deeply in humanity, in spite of the many difficulties, from which even the most earnest souls could not escape. They could not always see that Goodness in the world, there were things hard to reconcile with it, but deep down in their hearts they felt that it was supreme and they must be true to it. Then in due time they would see the full light of the Eternal shining on their faith. The second conviction was that the world at present was full of evil, which was antagonistic to the Supreme Goodness. They could not wholly reconcile the two, and it was the real problem of their life to resist the evil. In trying to raise men out of it, and up to the good, they were seeking to establish the Kingdom of God. In that country, which he almost hesitated to call Christian, they saw great numbers placed at moral disadvantage, and they desired to help their less fortunate brethren. They looked for the ideal future. They saw that things might be better and trusted they would be; and whether they would be or not, depended partly on the fidelity of their exertions in that field. There was no nobler or more hopeful field for such work than the Sunday-school.

Speaking of qualifications for that work, Dr. Drummond said that the highest and the indispensable qualification was the teacher's own communion with the infinite Source of Goodness. That was open to them all, and perhaps they did not realise as they ought how impossible it was to do the highest work except as the life of God Himself became mingled with their own. His Spirit dwelling within their spirit, sanctifying and filling their best purposes with purity and holiness. They should go to all kindly work with hearts consecrated by prayer. The same problems lay before them in their lowlier measure as before their great Master. As his words and deeds were not his own, but those of the Father who sent him, so must theirs be, so far as human frailty would allow. Only when they went to their work with the humble sense that the Goodness ruling over all was ruling in their hearts, and in some measure would work through them, could they devote themselves hopefully, trustfully, buoyantly to the task that lay before them. Yet purity and love alone were not sufficient. Misdirected through ignorance and want of skill, much mischief was done by kindly people who did not see what must be the result of their efforts. Thus knowledge was also necessary, and while they were not forgetful of those other graces, it was chiefly with a view to better equipment in knowledge that their present meeting was held.

The knowledge they required was of two kinds, of method and of subjects. Much depended on the method in organising a school, in arranging the classes and in preparing lessons. And it was good to have some systematic course of study in a school, so that the children should gain true thoughts of God and knowledge of the records of religious life contained in the Bible. In addition to the actual preparation for their work, he advised teachers, so far as time allowed, to have some independent course of reading on hand, that would enlarge their thought and give them a more intelligent apprehension of that grand literature, which they called the Bible.

In conclusion, he reverted to the words, "We are God's fellow-workers." Christianity had always been a redemptive religion. It clearly recognised the evils in the world, and Christ's life was consecrated to the overthrow of those evils. In his spirit they must go out to their work, first feeling the redemptive power in their own hearts, and then seeking to save men from their evils, from moral evils first, and thereby from physical evils, until the Kingdom of God should be come in the world. They should go with exultation to their work, feeling its sublimity, since it was God who worked in them, both to will and to do. In proportion as they forgot themselves in the glory of the work, ready to bear and forbear, to be forgiving, content and patient, to seek only that the work might prosper, they would feel the heavenly exultation that would lift them above all petty vexations of the world, and they would have the conviction that the heavenly Father would bless their work.

The unexpected number of the teachers present rendered it necessary that the lectures also should be given in the chapel, the lecture-room being appropriated for the common mid-day meal, which was a pleasant feature of the gathering. The first lecture was given, after the opening service, by the Rev. H. Rawlings, his subject being "Discipline."

LECTURE ON "DISCIPLINE."

Commencing with a vivid picture of his own early sufferings as a Sunday-school teacher, for the encouragement of others to persevere, Mr. Rawlings said that if only teachers would refuse to be discouraged, and to perseverance would add the study of discipline, they would not only overcome difficulties, but would learn how to obviate many of them, and they would find in children, as in the physical world, that the forces which resisted and defeated them so long as they were ignorant, would do their bidding as soon as they understood them. To such knowledge of child-nature and of the methods of dealing with it as would provide those results, he wished to stimulate them. He had himself been unhappy in his first essay at Sunday-school teaching, because he had no such knowledge. By a grave and strange omission, the curriculum of the college for teachers where he was studying did not provide for any instruction of the kind. But discipline must be studied. It concerned not merely specially troublesome classes, but the whole school, and the more teachers there were who understood discipline and could apply its principles in the most difficult cases, the better. There should always be one or more of the teachers who were ready to take the duties of superintendent.

The first principle, for which he begged their earnest consideration, he formulated thus: Regard discipline as the primary condition and means of good influence in the Sunday-school.

There was often indifference to discipline, and even aversion from it, and not by any means always through carelessness or want of real interest in the welfare of the children. There was a desire on the part of many earnest teachers not to be as a mere schoolmaster to the children, but as a friend, and to make the school like home, ruling not by force but by love. In reply to such protestations he said that as general expressions of feeling he entirely concurred in them, but as objections to discipline they were irrelevant, baseless, and misleading. The protestations which implied that discipline was incompatible with friendship between teacher and scholar, that it destroyed the home spirit, that it appealed to fear instead of love—all told against, instead of for, their authors when it was realised that there must be order in the Sunday-school as everywhere else in human society. That was so far a foolish friendship or love which professed that it could do without discipline, and as for the home spirit, what was home without order? Certainly not a model for any kind of educational institution.

His first principle he would develop by means of two corollaries, one for each of the two principal objects of Sunday-school work—the imparting of knowledge and the training of character.

The first corollary was: Never begin or continue your lesson until your scholars are orderly and attentive. "Never" was a strong word. It might be replied: "To begin the lesson is sometimes precisely the best way to get the attention of the children. They attend the moment they are interested." But attention and order were matters of degree. If a teacher stood before his class with the air of the conductor of an orchestra, and insisted on the uniform alertness which is required when all instruments have to sound together, he would be a pedant. But when it was said that children attend the moment they are interested, that assumed some amount of attention at the outset, for a child who is not attending at all cannot become interested. Sufficient attention for that purpose was all he had insisted on; but many teachers estimated the amount at too low a rate, and their teaching in consequence was unduly arduous to themselves and unprofitable to their scholars. The habit of talking in class was not to be lightly regarded. The teacher should have absolute control of any talking, and be able to check it whenever it was untimely, excessive, or in any way an interruption rather than a furtherance of the lesson. A teacher must be ready to deal very firmly with his scholars in that matter, or he would soon find that an offence which seemed so small at first became great enough to ruin his lesson and destroy his influence. The teacher who shrank (as it was said) from obtruding discipline upon his scholars obtruded it in the long run more painfully and continually than the prompt and firm disciplinarian. He was perpetually talking to them about order. He became the nagging teacher—that most objectionable of personalities in the eyes of the scholar.

There was a great principle involved in this, which he would state in his second corollary: Every act has a social as well as a personal significance, and the ultimate object of discipline is not mere repression of wrongdoing, but the establishment in the child's mind of an ideal of behaviour such as promotes order and happiness in all human relations, for such an ideal takes away the desire to do wrong.

Strictness in checking talk in class he had justified on the ground that it hindered teaching. But they must go further, and see that it was wrong for a child to hinder teaching by chattering, not merely because he lost his own opportunity of learning, but because he hindered others. Thus the offence became more serious, and a child could be made to feel that it was unfair to the rest and rude to the teacher, and so was guilty of a social offence. Thus discipline in school became a training in character; it should not be regarded as an unpleasant necessity, but every opportunity should be seized of widening by its means the moral vision and deepening the moral sensibilities. He urged upon his hearers the vital importance of that matter. Sunday-schools should be as scrupulous in discipline as day-schools; they should aim with a definiteness too rare in other schools, not at mere repression of wrongdoing, but at the establishment in the child's mind of an ideal of behaviour such as would promote order and happiness in all human relations.

In the course of some discussion which followed the lecture, Miss Pritchard said that as supplementing what Mr. Rawlings had said, they should read his admirable little book of "Practical Hints to Teachers," published by the Association.

After lunch the company adjourned to the library, where Miss Toulmin Smith, the librarian, kindly explained the windows, portraits, and other objects of interest. Subsequently, Mr. F. A. Kerry gave a short organ recital in the chapel, after which a visit was paid to Mansfield College, where the visitors were most courteously received by Principal Fairbairn and Mr. Vernon Bartlett.

In the evening a discussion on "Elder Scholars' Classes" took place in the lecture room, opened by Mr. Ion Pritchard. The chair was taken by Mr. S. S. Tayler, who, in a short introductory speech, expressed the great indebtedness of the Sunday School Association to the Principal and Professors of Manchester College, for the manner in which they had received the teachers gathered for that session. Their gratitude was not lessened when they remembered how, ever since the removal of the College to London, some forty-six years ago, its teachers had generously helped the work of the Association.

PAPER ON ELDER SCHOLARS' CLASSES.

The formation of his senior class, Mr. Pritchard said, had been a question of growth. Boys of the age of fourteen and fifteen were difficult to deal with, as they were mostly earning their living and felt the discipline of the school irksome. He had solved the discipline question by holding the class at his own house, but the young men joined the rest of the school at three special services in the chapel during the year. The foundation of such a class was good comradeship, and to secure this the Sunday meeting was not enough. They had formed a social club, which met in the schoolroom on Saturday evenings from seven to ten for gymnastics and the usual games. There was a strict rule against gambling, and smoking had to be forbidden because of the limited accommodation available. Two of the young men acted as caterers, and served cocoa and biscuits. In the summer country rambles took the place of the club meetings. By this means the Sunday-class had been kept together, and his personal influence had been greatly strengthened. On Sunday afternoons the first three-quarters of an hour were given to some subject bearing on the more serious side of life, the remaining half-hour to some book or chat over the events of the past week. During the seven or eight years his present class had lasted many and various subjects had been taken up. For two years they had been occupied with the Bible. Of other books he had found the Rev. C. F. Dole's "Citizen and Neighbour" one of the best; also Mr. John Dendy's "Successful Life," the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Man's Knowledge of God," Dr. Herford's "Story of Religion in England," and Miss F. E. Cooke's biography of Dorothea Dix had been very popular. Then instead of a book, subjects for discussion had been taken up, such as "What being a Christian means," Socialism, Individualism, Poverty, Wealth, Free Trade, Competition, Co-operation, Arbitration, Credit, Patriotism. After receiving a distinct request for information, he had devoted a few afternoons to an explanation of the doctrinal bearings of Unitarianism, which awakened an active interest. He could not say that as a result of his class work many new members had been added to the church roll. But he had aimed at raising the standard of conduct in the young men, and in that he might claim to some extent to have succeeded.

In the subsequent discussion, Miss YOUNGERMAN, of Birmingham, earnestly advocated mixed classes for the seniors as well as the very young, as being the natural method for training of character, leading to good manners and chivalry, and healthy friendships. She also advocated meetings for debate and guild meetings.

Mr. J. ROWCROFT, of Hyde, said that the teachers should make themselves one with the young people, yet maintaining a proper dignity. They should never fail to acknowledge their scholars, wherever they met them.

Mr. W. HOLMES, of Hull, told of a successful mixed elder class in the old chapel there, which had been practically a religious service specially adapted to the young people.

Miss NEWMAN, of Bristol, said that their efforts to induce the young people to join the church had met with disappointment, but they had found a special week-night service very helpful, when Mr. Blatchford had come down to speak to them on the leading points of their faith as Unitarians.

Miss LITCHFIELD, of Birmingham, described a Church Institute for social gatherings, held six times during the winter, established by Mr. Jacks, which aimed at bringing members of the congregation into contact with the elder scholars.

Miss MALCOLM and Miss PATTERSON, of Holywood, the Revs. A. E. VOYSEY and U. V. HERFORD also joined in the discussion, and Mr. PRITCHARD, in replying, mentioned a good plan adopted by Miss Johnson, of Liverpool, who had prepared a syllabus of lessons for some months, and had printed it for the use of her adult class at Garston.

Of the successive days of the session we cannot attempt any ordered chronicle. The first Friday was followed by seven full working days, not counting the intervening Sunday. Each morning commenced with a short devotional service in the chapel, followed by two lectures. The first hour was devoted to lectures by the Professors of Manchester College, in the following order: two lectures by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter on "How the Old Testament Grew" and on "Old Testament Wisdom"; a lecture by the Rev. C. B. Upton on "The Relation of Ethics to Religious Belief"; two lectures by Dr. Drummond on "The Apostle Paul and his Epistles," special attention being devoted to the Epistle to the Romans; and two lectures by the Rev. J. E. Odgers on "The Historical Development of Liberal Nonconformity." The substance of these valuable lectures we may hope to have in a permanent form, together with other fruits of the session, in the next annual volume of The Helper. The second hour dealt with various practical aspects of the teacher's work, as will be seen from the abstract of Mr. Rawlings' lecture given above, and others that will follow. The afternoons were devoted to visits to various colleges, and further excursions in the neighbourhood, and the evenings, also, after the first night's discussion, were free for friendly intercourse and other holiday purposes. On Monday evening a conversazione was held in the library of the College, when the guests were received by the Principal and Mrs. Drummond, and Friday was a Lantern evening.

On Sunday, at morning service, the chapel was completely filled, even the seats behind the screen being occupied, so that there must have been a congregation of about 200 present, and the singing of the hymns was delightful. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter preached a sermon on "The Christianity of our Time," which will shortly appear in full in these columns. In the afternoon, at the Sunday-school of the Charles-street Institute, model lessons were given, in the presence of a number of visitors, by Miss Effie C. Turner to the infant-class, Mr. A. H. Biggs to children from eight to twelve, and by Miss J. Upton to the eldest class. The only complaint was that the children were not naughty enough to exhibit the teachers' powers of discipline. Later in the afternoon an address was given in the chapel by Mr. Lucking Tavener, on the "Life, Works, and Ideals of Mr. G. F. Watts," some fine photographs of whose pictures were subsequently shown in the lecture room. Our readers will be able to judge of the interest and value of the address from the articles on the same subject recently contributed by Mr. Tavener to THE INQUIRER. After tea, to which the company was entertained by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter and Mrs. Carpenter, another quiet hour was spent in the chapel with the singing of hymns and recital on the organ.

The second lecture on Saturday last was by Mr. Frank Taylor, head-master of the Stourbridge British School, whose subject was:—

"SOME DAY-SCHOOL METHODS APPLIED TO SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHING."

Day and Sunday-school, Mr. Taylor said, were curiously like and unlike, and it was extremely undesirable that they should ever be entirely one in method. The day-school was highly organised, everything making for good order. In the Sunday-school they had to rely chiefly on the sense of right and on the affections of the children. As to the teaching staff of the Sunday-school, there should be if possible only one superintendent, or at most two, one for morning and one for afternoon; and if that was not possible, those who shared the work should be familiar with one another's methods, so as to secure uniformity of control. Laxity of control on one Sunday and the opposite on the next was fatal to good discipline. The superintendent should always be early at school to prevent incipient mischief, and to welcome both children and teachers to school. It was of the utmost importance that both the assembling and dismissal should be orderly. To secure this was part of the superintendent's duty, but all the teachers must co-operate. In the day-school each teacher was responsible for the good order of his class all through, and so in Sunday-school the teacher must not think his responsibility ended when the teaching was over, and the rest could be left to the superintendent. To secure the proper singing by all of the closing hymn and the reverential joining in prayer was worth any sacrifice. Teachers should strive to make the closing of school really impressive. Responsibility sat lightly on many shoulders, in connection with voluntary services. But what would they think of a doctor in honorary attendance at a hospital who neglected the patients? Many difficulties of organisation in the school would be avoided by a little more of the spirit of bear and forebear, and if teachers recognised the duty of regular attendance and the subordination of personal desires to the good of the school.

Mixed classes for boys and girls he warmly commended as an incentive to work, and helpful to good order. As to methods of teaching, class books should be used only as aids to the lesson, not as the lesson itself. The teacher must not let the use of a text-book on any subject become merely a poor apology for a reading lesson. He must not think that the lesson was in the book, so that his own irregularity was of no consequence, and anyone could take up the class without injury. As aids to teaching, many of the books published by the Association were admirable. If, instead of supplying reading-books for the class, school authorities would supply books for the preparation of the teacher, the cost would be less and it would be far better for the school. A lesson was not the lesson of a Sunday-school teacher, unless it had directly or indirectly the welfare of the children in view. The culture of the moral and religious side of the child's nature was the great aim. Much came from the character of the teacher, but much also from the character of the teaching. In the old days the scholar learnt to help himself, now he had to learn to help others, which was a grander aim. He did not mean that every lesson should be directly on the moral virtues, but somewhere in every lesson the aim should be realised of uplifting, inspiring, ennobling, in some measure to bring home to the children the nobility and grandeur of a good life.

Too much stress could not be laid on the necessity of preparation beforehand, to be clear as to the subject of the lesson, to arrange the material, furnish good illustrations, and be sure of impressing the main thought on the children. In a scientific lesson, for instance, boys must not be left to draw the moral for themselves, it must be brought home to them by skilful teaching. "Through the senses to the sense" should be the guiding principle. The Sunday-school teacher might have many subjects, but the great aim must be to mould character; and that aim was better reached indirectly than directly, for children resented moral preaching. The conversational method of teaching was best. It made great demands on the teacher, but the result well repaid the effort. The questioning in class should not be all left to the end, and he advised the giving of marks, as a ready method of distributing due praise, which was more helpful than blame. Teachers should acquire the habit of looking for praiseworthy things in their scholars, and they should encourage esprit de corps in the class.

At the close of the lecture testimony was borne on several sides to the great help of music in securing an orderly dismissal of the school, the children filing out in order, while hymns were sung. Very cordial acknowledgment was made of the value of the lecture.

On Monday the second lecture was by Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD, and was illustrated by the help of a blackboard and illustrative drawings, the subject being:—

"WHAT CAN WE TEACH AND HOW?"

The great aim, Miss Pritchard said, was to lead the children up to truth and righteousness and love; and this could not be done by talking about it, the true life must be glowing in those who teach.

In imparting it many kinds of lesson might be used. Of the Bible a subsequent lecture would speak, and to the value she set on that her book of Beginnings and the two volumes of the Helper bore witness; science also would be dealt with in another lecture. The mainstay of the average teacher was twofold, the hymn and the story. Of how not to use these two invaluable instruments Miss Pritchard gave an amusing illustration. It was essential, she said, that all should learn the same hymn, the teacher as well as the children, only the teacher should learn one verse ahead of the class, so as to ponder it during the week, and gather material for explanation and illustration. Every child should own a copy of the hymn-book, for it was a missionary in the household. Taking the hymn "We are sailing o'er an ocean," it was then shown how the lessons should be given. At the first two lessons there should be nothing about the hymn, but the talk should be about the ocean, the waves and the rocky shore, with pictures; and then about ships, and sailing across the ocean, and seeing in a storm the distant lights. Then when the children's imagination was kindled with the subject, the hymns should be begun. As to stories, they must be true to the truest and the highest. Not necessarily out of history books or biographies, for in fiction there was often profounder truth of character-drawing to be found, and character was the great end. Boys should read biographies of women as well as men, to learn to see the nobleness on every side of life. Sunday should be a day of recreation, and children still at school should not be given home lessons from Sunday-school, or be made to write anything on Sunday. But for those who had left school it was very useful to have writing to do. The use of the blackboard in class was invaluable. Even the roughest drawing fixed a thought in the imagination and helped to recall the whole train of the teaching. To young children the different points of theology could not well be taught, but they must be grounded in the fundamental truths of love to God and man. Afterwards when the need arose, theological teaching came in naturally. The children of our own households should be brought up to the knowledge of the principles which have separated us from other churches and to clear doctrinal convictions, so that they may become in their turn members of the churches. In Sunday-school teaching, as in charity, we can only do our best, but we must be content only with our best.

Some discussion followed on the importance of definite doctrinal teaching, and it was strongly urged that the practice of preparing young people for membership by such instruction and then at a special dedication service receiving them into the congregation, should be more widely adopted.

After Professor Upton's lecture on Tuesday, which we hope before long to publish, the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD gave a lecture on

"HOW TO GIVE A BIBLE LESSON?"

At the outset Mr. Wood referred to the difficulty many people now have in using the Bible for the religious instruction of their children, and he urged that they should not be afraid, and should not be too rationalistic with children. They should read the old Bible stories as they would read Homer, trusting the healthy instincts of the children to take what was good and leave the bad. They should not trouble the young minds with questions of historical and critical accuracy, but only be sure that the moral distinctions of true and false were kept clear.

The old stories, especially in Genesis, should not be neglected. They dealt with simple, primitive elements of right and wrong. The characters were drawn in strong simple outline, and the pictures were broadly typical. The story of the parting of Abraham and Lot was a good example, a lesson in magnanimity. First interest in the subject must be created, by talk about magnanimity, illustrated, perhaps, by the story of Sir Philip Sidney. Then the Bible passage should be read, but not verse by verse round the class; and, if possible, twice—the second time all together. Explanation should follow, and by the catechetical method, first finding out what idea the children have of what they have read, and then adding to their knowledge—first as to the words, which are always interesting to children, and then as to the story. They should make the children tell the story in their own words, or else draw it out by question and answer. Then the story should be illustrated; one illustration was better than two in one lesson, and it should be simple, direct, and detailed. In the matter of illustration with children, they should amplify, not multiply so as to confuse. Then they must lead up to “that fear-some thing,” the application. A lesson, like a sermon, should cumulate and culminate; and was a failure if it did not make one distinct impression and teach one clear truth of character or religion. The conclusion of the lesson should be its most impressive part. It might be quiet, but not tame; it should not be laboured, but in terse, pointed words enforce the truth. It was good also by questioning to get the children to make the application, that so their sense of right and wrong might express itself.

The catechetical method was far the best with children. It must be distinguished from the use of a catechism, which stereotyped answers which were learnt by rote and came to be regarded with a blind reverence. For the catechetical method the most careful preparation was necessary. The lecture concluded with the following rules:—

(1.) Catechising should always proceed from the known to the unknown. Begin from ground common to you and the scholars.

(2.) Catechising should be simple and direct; one question at a time, without unnecessary words; the questioning must not be vague.

(3.) Do not ask questions the answers to which you know must be guessed. Stop all guessing.

(4.) See that each question requires a little mental exercise for its answer.

(5.) Cultivate great variety in the form in which you put your questions. If you receive a wrong or half-answer, do not repeat the question in the same words, but give it another turn.

(6.) By questioning lead the children themselves to discriminate between good and evil, and to hear the voices without, which are in harmony with the voice of conscience within.

On Wednesday morning the Rev. J. J. WRIGHT gave a lecture on the object and method of Sunday-school teaching, part of which, at any rate, we shall hope to print in full. Here we can only further mention the discussion on Thursday of “The Ideal Sunday-school” and the second lectures on Friday and Saturday by the Rev. J. FREESTON on “Religious Lessons from Natural Objects,” and Miss EDITH DRUMMOND on “Method of Preparing and Presenting a Lesson.”

Of this most admirable series of lectures we will conclude our report by saying: May their lessons be very widely put into practice.

HENRY SEPTIMUS SUTTON.

WE have received from Mr. Albert Broadbent, of 19, Oxford-street, Manchester, a booklet, in paper covers, containing Mr. Sutton’s “Rose’s Diary and other Poems.” The author, we are told, has consented to this publication, “not through the trade booksellers, but wholly by private friendly endeavour of readers valuing the verses.” The price is 3d. net, or by post 3½d. Mr. Cornish’s complete edition of the poems is still to be had, but this booklet, containing the Diary and a selection from the other poems, may act as a reader messenger to make the author more widely known. Lovers of the “Diary” will be glad to have copies to send to friends. Postal mission workers might often find it a welcome addition to the books of devotion sent to thirsty and solitary souls. Many of our readers will be familiar with the sections from the “Diary” included in Dr. Martineau’s “Hymns of Praise and Prayer.” The following are among the most beautiful and characteristic of the verses:—

The day with light its genial self engirds;

The trees are glad with fluty voices dear:
“Thou art my God!” When I say o’er these words,

I see a light beyond the day, and hear
Voices far richer than the song of birds.

Unless I strive these people dear to bless,
I do not love my God. If still I seek
No good or joy of theirs, and acquiesce
In what makes weak the strong, or wrongs the weak,

Myself of God’s own love I dispossess.

Prayer is the hand that catcheth hold on peace;

Nay, ’tis the very heart of nobleness,
Whose pulses are the measure of the stress

Wherewith He doth us, we do Him possess.

If these should fail, all our true life would cease.

How beautiful it is to be alive!

To wake each morn as if the Maker’s grace

Did us afresh from nothingness derive,
That we might sing, “How happy is our case,

How beautiful it is to be alive!”

To read in God’s great Book, until we feel Love for the love that gave it; then to kneel

Close unto Him, whose truth our souls will thrive,

While every moment’s joy doth more reveal

How beautiful it is to be alive!

Rather to go without what might increase
Our worldly standing than our souls deprive

Of frequent speech with God, or than to cease

To feel, through having wasted health or peace,

How beautiful it is to be alive!

Not to forget, when pain and grief draw nigh,

Into the ocean of time past to dive

For memories of God’s mercies, or to try

To bear all sweetly, hoping still to cry,

“How beautiful it is to be alive!”

Thus ever towards man’s height of nobleness

Strive still some new progression to contrive,

Till, just as any other friend’s, we press

Death’s hand; and, having died, feel none the less

How beautiful it is to be alive!

THE WRESTING OF SCRIPTURE.

A STRIKING instance of this has quite recently been placed before the public. It occurs in a very remarkable connection, no other than the new decorative work in St. Paul’s Cathedral, London. Here, beneath the lofty dome, may be read the words “The Lord has laid on him the iniquities of us all.” This inscription is displayed in large characters, and forms a conspicuous portion of the adornment.

Those who have authorised such an addition ought to know that the expression is unwarranted, if intended, as no doubt it is, to be read in the popular orthodox sense, usually ascribed to it. The words are taken from the Book of Isaiah (liii. 6), and in their original connection and import had nothing to do with the teaching or the work of Jesus Christ. He is not the “Servant of the Lord” spoken of in several places by this prophet. Nothing in the interpretation of Isaiah is more certainly ascertained than this: that the “Servant” so frequently introduced by the later Isaiah is the idealised and personified people of Israel, especially the more faithful portion of them, who, when the prophet wrote were living in captivity in Babylonia.

The reader, of course, will not take this statement on the mere authority of the writer of these words. He may, therefore, be referred to the expositions of the greatest Hebrew scholars of Germany from Gesenius downward to our own time, and also to some of those who are among the best authorities of our own country, as, for example, Professors Cheyne and Driver. Even the reader who is not minutely acquainted with the details of Old Testament exegesis may very sufficiently judge of the point for himself, if he will refer to such passages as Isaiah xli. 8, 9, with many more (as xlii. 19; xliii. 10; liv. 1, 2; xlviii. 20). From these it will be seen how clear it is that the prophet speaks of an ideal Israel, whom he terms Jehovah’s Servant, and who is called to endure persecution and suffering at the hands of his conquerors. These unhappy circumstances the prophet, in accordance with the ancient ideas of his people, regards as the consequence of their own unfaithfulness and transgression. But they are possessed of an expiatory efficacy. They avail not only for the Servant himself, but for the whole nation of which he is a part, and is now the representative. The iniquities of all, the punishment due to their transgressions, have fallen even upon him. "The Lord (Jehovah) hath laid on him the iniquities of us all."

Let the words be read as they ought to be, in connection with their immediate context and the historical circumstances amidst which they were written, and there can be no question that the prophet is referring to the sufferings of the exiled people under the appellation of the Servant, and also anticipating their speedy deliverance from their captivity—(Isaiah lii. 9-12). The words, therefore, have no real or original reference to Christ.

G. V. S.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the Theologia Germanica.

How we are to put on the Life of Christ from Love, and not for the sake of Reward, and how we must never grow careless concerning it, or cast it off.

Now, wherever a man hath been made a partaker of the divine nature, in him is fulfilled the best and noblest life, and the worthiest in God's eyes, that hath been or can be. And of that eternal love which loveth goodness as goodness and for the sake of goodness, a true, noble, Christ-like life is so greatly beloved, that it will never be forsaken or cast off. Where a man hath tasted this life, it is impossible for him ever to part with it, were he to live until the Judgment Day. And though he must die a thousand deaths, and though all the sufferings that ever befel all creatures could be heaped upon him, he would rather undergo them all, than fall away from this excellent life; and if he could exchange it for an angel's life, he would not.

This is our answer to the question, "If a man by putting on Christ's life, can get nothing more than he hath already, and serve no end, what good will it do him?" This life is not chosen in order to serve any end, or to get anything by it, but for love of its nobleness, and because God loveth it and esteemeth it so greatly. And whoever saith that he hath had enough of it, and may now lay it aside, hath never tasted nor known it; for he who hath truly felt or tasted it, can never give it up again. And he who hath put on the life of Christ with the intent to win or deserve aught thereby, hath taken it up as an hireling, and not for love, and is altogether without it. For he who doth not take it up for love, hath none of it at all; he may dream indeed that he hath put it on, but he is deceived. Christ did not lead such a life as his for the sake of reward, but out of love; and love maketh such a life light and taketh away all its hardships, so that it becometh sweet and is gladly endured. But to him who hath not put it on for love, but hath done so, as he dreameth, for the sake of reward, it is utterly bitter and a weariness, and he would fain be quit of it. And it is a sure token of an hireling that he wisheth his work were at end. But he who truly loveth it, is not offended at its toil nor suffering, nor the length of time it lasteth. Therefore it is written: "To serve God and live to Him, is easy to him who doeth it." Truly it is so to him who doth it for love, but it is hard and wearisome to him who doth it for hire. It is the same with all virtue and good works, and likewise with order, laws, obedience to precepts, and the like. But God rejoiceth more over one man who truly loveth, than over a thousand hirelings.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A NEW BOOK FOR THE CHILDREN.*

MANY of you will remember the address on "Old Lamps for New" by the Rev. John Byles, which appeared in this column in our New Year's number; and you will be glad to know that Mr. Byles has now published a new book, in which that address and twenty-three other of his delightful "Talks to the Children" are gathered together. The first is about the "Legend of St. Mark," which gives the title to the book; others are taken from the history of England, others again from beautiful old legends or stories from Church history. One, called "Beautiful Within," begins about Socrates, and tells also about Miss Frances Willard, but at the beginning there is a mistake, which you must correct, if you get the book. It speaks of Socrates as having lived at Athens "four hundred years ago," but really it was four hundred years before the time of Christ, and that is what Mr. Byles meant to say.

You could not hear one of these "Talks" without having to listen, and you would be sure to be interested. The book is full of good stories and good teaching, and I hope a great many of you will be able to get it. To show you still better how interesting it is, I will repeat here three of the stories told in the talk on "The Greatest Thing in the World." That greatest thing is love, which comes to us from God, who is Love; and these are the stories Mr. Byles tells about it:—

1.—The first tells of a great storm that swept over England not long ago, and especially over the West and North. On land quarries were flooded, railways were stopped, chimneys were blown down, and great mountains were covered with snow; while out at sea, ships were dismasted and wrecked. On the north coast of Wales, towards morning, a sea captain was discovered washed ashore. Lashed to his breast was the dead body of his little son. To save the child from being carried away by the waves, and to give him warmth, so far as it was possible to do so, the father had tied the little fellow fast to his own person, and there for seven long hours, the wild storm beating upon him, he had stood in the rigging of his vessel supporting the body of the boy. That was a father's love. It was love like the love of God, for He binds His children to Himself with "the cords of love and the bands of a man."

2.—The second story is this: On that same dreadful night, and on the same north coast of Wales, in Colwyn Bay, a vessel was driven on the rocks. Her crew consisted of four men, and these took refuge in the rigging. Great seas broke over the vessel from stem to stern, and every minute it seemed as if those men would be washed away. On the shore was a great crowd of people watching the vessel and its crew. They were but a hundred and fifty yards away. But between the vessel and the shore was an angry, surging, foaming sea, broken only by the dark outlines of sharp, jagged rocks. No lifeboat was at hand. No ordinary boat was fit to ride on such a sea. What was to be done? A common broad-beamed open boat was found at some distance off, and, heavy though it was, carried on men's shoulders to the place. And in this common boat, all unadapted as it was for such a sea, five brave men, taking their lives in their hands, put forth, resolved, if possible, to rescue those poor shipwrecked sailors. Out they went into that tempestuous sea, fifty pairs of hands pushing them into the boiling surf, and twice a hundred pairs of eyes watching to mark their progress. But the wind and waves were too strong for them, and they were beaten back, and their boat hurled upon the shore. Again the boat was manned, and again the attempt was made. But again without success. And so for three long awful hours the struggle was continued. Six times the boat went out, and six times it was angrily driven back. At length, on the seventh attempt, the vessel of the shipwrecked men was reached, a rope was flung, a connection was made, and the half-drowned and perished men were safely brought to land. This was redeeming love. And it appears all the more wonderful when we remember that none of the men who risked their lives knew one of the men whom they went forth to save. They went, as Christ went, "to seek and save that which was lost."

3.—The third story is this: Some time ago a man was working on the side of the Great Western Railway. As he was busy with his work he heard the falling of a great piece of stone or rock, and, looking up, he saw it had fallen right across the rails. But he saw more than this; he saw in the distance the express approaching. Not a moment was to be lost. In a few short seconds the train would reach the place on which the rock had fallen, and it would certainly be wrecked. Forgetful of himself, the man ran forward to the spot, and, reaching it just before the train arrived, threw himself with all his might upon the rock, pushing it aside. An instant more, and the train was at the place; the stone was gone, but the man who had removed it lay crushed to death by the wheels of the engine, from which he had no time to escape. That was self-sacrificing love. "And greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life."

Those are the stories which Mr. Byles tells, and they show us how that love, which is of God, may be in human hearts. We all of us know what it means. As we ourselves gain more and more power of loving and of self-sacrifice, we are able to understand more of the love of God, our Father, who cares for us all.

TEACHERS IN COUNCIL.

It was a happy thought to bring together in a Summer School, in which serious study and pleasant social intercourse and holiday should be wisely blended, teachers from our Sunday-schools in different parts of the country, to receive instruction in what it is most important that they should know from those most competent to teach, and at the same time to have the opportunity of taking counsel together and of enjoying the stimulus of cordial meetings in the interests of their special work. And seldom has a happy thought been so completely realised at a first attempt as in the Summer School that has been meeting in Manchester College and closes its ten days' session at Oxford to-day. We are confident that every one of the teachers, not less than 140 in all, who have enjoyed the whole or part of this brief session, must return to work quickened by a new earnestness of purpose, with clearer ideals and renewed enthusiasm for the service, and at the same time richer in knowledge, and even more enriched by insight into the method by which yet further knowledge may be gained.

At one of the first meetings of the session Mr. S. S. TAYLER most appropriately reminded his hearers how greatly for many years the Sunday School Association, and through the Association our schools throughout the country, have been indebted to the Principal and Professors of Manchester College. From the time of the removal of the College from Manchester to London in 1853, the interest of the Principal of those days, the Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, and of Dr. MARTINEAU, was actively engaged on behalf of the work of the Association, an interest which they handed on to their successors. From that time to this the advice of the Professors in the matter of literature has been freely at the disposal of the Association, and some of the most valuable of its own publications are from their pen. Thus it seemed a natural sequence to such ungrudging service that this Summer School should be held in the College, and the proposal was made with confidence in the ready and most cordial response with which it has been received. But the very fact of that readiness, and the remembrance that it is at the close of an exhausting session, when their time of rest had come, that these fresh lectures have been undertaken, only add to our grateful sense of the many obligations under which we rest to the Professors of the College. The benefit of the lectures on Old and New Testament subjects, on Ethics, and on the History of Liberal Nonconformity, we may trust will not be confined to those who heard them, but that in many schools which were represented at Oxford the other teachers may be able to share in the fresh interest awakened and the instruction given. And we are glad to be assured that, at any rate, the substance of the lectures will find a place in next year's volume of The Helper.

Whoever will read the somewhat full reports of the session in our present issue will see how great was the value of the lectures given on practical aspects of the teacher's work. Teachers of wide experience and the highest competence were the lecturers, and they dealt with just those subjects on which the inexperienced teacher needs the wisest guidance. The questions asked after the lectures and the discussions which sometimes took place, and not less, perhaps, the private conversations among teachers from different schools, arising out of what had been said, added greatly to the interest of the session, and will have rendered still more service when the information and discussions are carried further in the schools to which they will be reported.

To not a few of the teachers delightful memories of a first visit to Oxford will be among the treasures that they take home. Most vivid will doubtless be the memory of the chapel and library of Manchester College itself, with the great series of Burne-Jones windows and the other windows in the library and the statue of Dr. MARTINEAU, because within those walls were spent so many hours in study and the happiest companionship; but to these will be added a rich store of pictures of the older Colleges, with their stately buildings, and the quietness and old-world charm of the College gardens, and beyond these the river and the open country. There were, perhaps, some teachers who had given up the greater part of their short annual holiday to these ten days at Oxford. We do not think they will regret the choice that took them there; they will feel that it was worth while to make some sacrifice for the sake of such a glimpse of the ancient University, and of those ideals, both of beauty and of learning, with which it is so richly endowed.

This first session of the Teachers' Summer School has completely justified itself, and we can only hope that in coming years it may be often possible to hold such a session, so that an increasing number of schools may in turn send their teachers to share the undoubted advantages and the great pleasure of the gatherings. This year places as far removed as Newcastle-on-Tyne, Padiham and Stalybridge, Belfast and Holywood, Bristol, Plymouth and Bridport, Brighton, Norwich and Hull have been represented, as well as London and Midland towns; and while it may be well from the experience of this first year to limit the numbers of each gathering to about 150, we could wish that in time every one of our schools should have shared the benefits to be so gained. And certainly no one will think that one visit is enough, but those who have now learnt what they may find in our College and at Oxford will eagerly look for the time when they may renew such impressions, for the further building up of that which is best in life.

"A CATECHISM OF RELIGION."

UNDER this title the Rev. H. W. HAWKES's latest of many gifts to the good cause is published. In a note of introduction he modestly says, "No shred of authority attaches to this catechism." Of ecclesiastical authority it has, of course, not "a shred"; and yet there is an authority of wisdom and insight to which the author of every such work must aspire, in despite of modesty. For the catechetical method rests on solid convictions firmly presented, or it is nothing. Merely tentative expressions are better suited to some other form of composition. We are used to such hesitating and extremely guarded utterances nowadays that we are glad to think catechisms will not go quite out of date. Viewed simply as an instrument for the education of children, we confess this form of composition does not wholly attract us. Very few catechisms we have seen appear to have been written simply and solely for the benefit of the catechised. The catechist almost invariably has a circle of grown-up critics in view beyond the limits of his class, and now and again he flings a challenge at them over the heads of the little ones. If we say Mr. HAWKES's "Catechism" is not free from this obliquely pugnacious character, it is not that we consider him a serious offender in this respect. On the whole, we have seldom, if ever, met with a catechetical statement of the principles of religion which so satisfied us. Certainly, it is a valuable little work, and parents, ministers, and teachers will find it most helpful and suggestive as a guide amid some of the most controversial and the most important problems of religion.

It is obvious that the "Catechism" owes its existence to the publication of the "Evangelical Free Church Catechism." Some of the answers in that Catechism are avowedly repeated here, while others are as pointedly suggested by contrast. It is, perhaps, no great compliment, after all, to Mr. HAWKES to say that we have a greater feeling of logical sequence and completeness in perusing his work than we experience when studying the Free Church Catechism. Naturally, the production of one competent mind, free from the necessity of trimming and dexterous compromise of expression, is likely to prove a more satisfactory and homogeneous work than one by a committee composed of members of different sects. Mr. HAWKES's introductory clauses lay a foundation at once broader and firmer for the erection of a simple theology appropriate for children than is furnished by the corresponding section in the Evangelical Catechism. He defines religion itself before referring to the special aspect of religious thought presented in Christian teaching. He similarly speaks of revelation in its fullest sense before referring to the truths taught by Jesus of Nazareth. A considerable amplification takes place in the section relating to sin, its consequence, repentance and forgiveness, and it is only at the seventeenth question that we arrive at the point from which the Evangelicals start. The question is, "What is the Christian Religion?" The answer—"It is the religion of Jesus, who was called by his followers the Christ, or the Messiah of God." This may be compared with the reply given in the other Catechism—viz., "It is the religion founded by our Lord and Saviour JESUS CHRIST, who has brought to us the full knowledge of God and of Eternal Life." Of course, Mr. HAWKES avoids puzzling the young mind with any such insoluble problems as "the mystery of the Blessed Trinity." In its place he gives some excellent and helpful words as to the "Holy Spirit," and some equally good as to "How we think of Jesus." It is when we come to the section dealing with "the Church" that Mr. HAWKES most diametrically opposes the dicta of the Evangelical catechisers. He denies that Jesus founded any "Church," and maintains that what he preached was "the good tidings of the Kingdom of God"—a Kingdom which "is greater and wider than any Church." Nevertheless, the Catechism commends a church as "a visible brotherhood for the worship of God, for mutual edification, for the preaching of religious truth, and the advancement of the Kingdom of God." As further illustrating the difference between Mr. HAWKES's views and those of the Evangelicals, we may place together two answers from each Catechism. The Evangelicals say a Free Church is—

A Church which acknowledges none but Jesus Christ as Head, and, therefore, exercises its right to interpret and administer his laws without restraint or control by the State."

Mr. HAWKES says a Free Church is—

A communion or congregation which, existing for the worship of God, imposes no creed or special belief on its ministers or members, leaving perfect liberty of thought and conscience. It also acknowledges no control by the State in its religious affairs.

The corresponding two definitions of "a Christian minister" and "a minister" are, taken in the same order:—

A Christian minister is one who is called of God and the Church to be a teacher of the Word and a pastor of the Flock of Christ.

A minister is one who is called of God and a worshipping congregation to be a teacher of religion and a leader and example to the people.

From these quotations and remarks the general tone of Mr. HAWKES's Catechism may be inferred. We have perforce left untouched a number of interesting points in his work; but these will at once present themselves to those readers who take our advice and get a copy.* If they should use it only as a special kind of commentary on the Free Church Catechism, they will find it very useful. In this regard it may be respectfully urged upon our Evangelical brethren themselves. Undoubtedly they will miss much in it which they are accustomed to look for, but they should find in it, unless we are much mistaken, a good deal to provoke earnest thought. Their own new Catechism marks a great advance from the narrower and harsher views formerly held by orthodox Nonconformists. We are not too sanguine, we trust, in believing that they will be led yet farther onwards, and that in our brother's pages they will find trustworthy indications of the direction of their future progress. HYMN.

Written for the Unitarian Festival, held in Music Hall, Boston, June 1, 1899.

Tune: "Hamburg."

AGAIN we gather at one board,
Our hearts with Nature's own in tune,
While from her golden urn is poured
The lavish wealth of opening June.
One Life we own, one Spirit share,
One revelation manifold;
One purpose high, as one we fare,
One faith in growing freedom hold.
What voices call from out the past,
What memories glad this festal hour;
What visions light the future vast,
To gird with courage and with power!
O Thou by whom our fathers wrought,
In whom from earthly toil they rest,
Still hold us open to Thy thought,
And faithful to Thy high behest.

LITERATURE.

RECENT HELPS TO OLD TESTAMENT STUDY.*

ALL students of the Old Testament, as well as those interested in the vaster field of the history of religion, will welcome the treatise recently published by Professor Morris Jastrow (of the University of Pennsylvania) on "The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria."¹ The volume is offered as the second in the series of handbooks (edited by the distinguished author) on the "History of Religions." It is the product of many years of laborious study; the mere printing of its 790 pages afforded time enough for important works to appear of which no notice could be taken. The treatment of the subject follows the method laid down for the series. An opening chapter sketches the sources available for knowledge; a second describes the geographical and social environment. The way is then open for the main divisions, which are three in number—(i.) the history of the Pantheon in four historical stages, pp. 48-244; (ii.) the religious literature, pp. 245-611; and (iii.) temples and cultus, pp. 612-689. A final chapter supplies some concluding generalisations; and a very carefully compiled bibliography, followed by a copious index, brings the work to an end.

The details of such a book can only be judged by investigators of the author's own rank; and, as he points out in connection with the supposed Akkadian antecedents of ancient Babylonian culture, not even all cuneiform experts are equally qualified to offer an opinion. The general student can do no more than comment on the method and spirit of the work. The author's judicial handling of a question still under discussion like that just named at once inspires confidence in his care and impartiality: his wide range of learning, his courtesy and good temper, are equally evident.

To the ordinary reader the second and third divisions will be more interesting than the first. The local origins of the Babylonian pantheon are made clear, but the lists of gods whose names and titles may, after all, be sometimes only different phases of the same deity, are of less significance than the acts of prayer and worship. An exception must, indeed, be made in favour of the greater gods, such as Marduk in Babylon and Ashur in Assyria. The connection of the vicissitudes of their religious history with political change is always firmly grasped by Professor Jastrow. But he does not rate their significance so highly as some previous writers have done. He recognises in these figures a tendency to monotheism, but insists that it was only a tendency (p. 696); it lacked ethical earnestness; and he remarks that "unless a monotheistic conception of the universe is interpreted in an ethical sense, monotheism (or monolatry) has no great superiority, either religiously or philosophically, over polytheism." He rates the Egyptian religion accordingly at a higher level; though the sketch which he gives of Babylonian morals, the administration of justice, the status of woman who could dispose of her own property, the mitigations of slavery, leave no unfavourable impression of the Mesopotamian civilisation, compared with other great Oriental tyrannies. The religious literature of Babylonia, of which copious examples are presented in the second part of the book, does not however seem to have produced any hymns equal to the nobler psalms of the Nile poets. The magical texts occupy a position of inevitable prominence in Professor Jastrow's exposition; and even the higher elements of religion never properly disengaged themselves from this taint. How strong were the Babylonian influences in this direction on the later Judaism is carefully noted by the author in his concluding chapter.

The account of the myths and legends, of the views of life after death, and of the temples and the cult, brings into clearer light a number of points of contact between the religious ideas and usages of Israel and those of Babylonia. In spite of the criticisms of Jensen on Friedrich Delitzsch, Professor Jastrow holds that the existence of the Babylonian name Shu'alu (Hebr. Sheol) is fully assured, p. 559; he connects it with the word to "ask"; Sheol was the place of divination, whence the dead could send their answers to the questions of the living. The anthropological evidence is collected under the head of "tombs and burial customs": but why does Professor Jastrow assert that while the remains of dates, grain, poultry, and fish, show that the dead was thought capable of hunger, his weapons and ornaments were placed with him as a sign of affection, p. 598? The need for the distinction is not obvious; though it may well have been the case that when the original meaning of the rite had been forgotten, the custom was kept up out of pious care. The cosmic signification of the temples is well described; and due weight is given to the parallel between Solomon's "sea" and the great basin employed in the Mesopotamian temples as the symbol of the "deep," p. 653, in proof of the influence of Babylonian culture in Canaan.

The book naturally contains misprints (such as capitol frequently for capital; Diodorus Seculus, pp. 431, 435, for Siculus; areas for acres, p. 623); and the punctuation is often irritating; and the spelling of names is not reduced to uniformity (e.g., Nebo or Nabu, p. 220). But these are small drawbacks to so masterly a treatise. It is with a heroic modesty that the author observes that "the chief reason for writing a book is to prepare the way for the next on the same subject." Let us hope that that "next" in this field may be a new edition of his own work.

Two fresh instalments of Professor Haupt's great enterprise, the "Polychrome Bible," deserve a hearty welcome. Professor W. H. Bennett is responsible for "Joshua," the Hebrew text of which was published some time ago.² The critical problems arising out of the combination of sources in Joshua are numerous and intricate; they are treated with great skill and care; and it is to be regretted that the ordinary reader, who is precluded by the conditions of Professor Haupt's plan from learning why one paragraph is coloured green and another red, will have no idea of the labour which lies behind the results presented on the particoloured page. The text is purged of numerous glosses, but Professor Bennett exercises a wise reserve in correction, though he can propose a suggestive emendation when required.* In the translation an effort is made to modernise the Biblical style which will strike different readers differently. We are free to confess that the frequent omission of the particle "and," which serves so many purposes in Hebrew, often produces a bald disjointed effect. How far this is part of the plan of the series, we are not aware; but the same result is sometimes apparent in Professor Toy's "Ezekiel," and we have already noted it in Professor Moore's "Judges," so that it is probably due to the general editorial method. The notes are brief; they have been enriched by a long account of the Tel-el-Amarna tablets (occupying a sixth of the whole commentary); but some students might have preferred a fuller treatment of the geography of the survey xiii.-xxi. A careful alphabetical list of cities is provided, though comparatively few identifications are regarded as absolutely certain, and a cautious judgment restrains Professor Bennett from adding new guesses to the conjectures which already abound. Many readers will wish that the cuts from battle scenes on Egyptian or Assyrian monuments and other similar illustrations could have been exchanged for a good map recording the sites which Professor Bennett accepts as established. The historical and theological significance of the analysis is not obtruded on the student. But whoever patiently compares the different sections of the records of the conquest, will find out that the picture of the victorious and desolating energy of Joshua as he sweeps the land from South to North is not to be taken as actual fact. The universal destruction of the Canaanite populations expresses a later theological antipathy; it is not founded on what really occurred; still less can it supply sanctions for modern warfare!

In dealing with "Ezekiel," Professor Toy undertakes a task of a different kind.³ Only by an occasional eccentricity of criticism—such as even a great Rabbinical scholar like Zunz might perpetrate—has the authenticity of the book been called in question. From end to end it speaks with one voice; and it has escaped the interpolations or additions which have found their way so extensively into other books both older and more recent than the work of the son of Buzi. Here, therefore, is no rainbow-hued page. On the other hand from various causes the text is often corrupt or obscure; and a fine tact is needful for its restoration. The importance of Ezekiel for the history of Israel's religion has of late drawn a number of scholars to this task; and Professor Toy has been able to use the researches in which Cornill and others have preceded him. A comparison of the sublime passage describing Yahweh's return to the Temple with the Revised Version, will at once show the superiority of Professor Toy's rendering:—

xlili. 1-7.—Then he took me to the gate that faced the East, and lo the Glory of the God of Israel came from the East, and His voice was like the sound of many waters, and the earth shone with His Glory. The appearance which I saw was like that which I saw when he came to destroy the city, or like that which I saw at the river Chebar. I fell on my face. The Glory of JHVH entered the Temple by the East gate. Then the spirit lifted me up, and took me into the inner court, and lo, the Glory of JHVH filled the Temple. Then I heard one speaking from the Temple, the man meanwhile standing beside me, and He said to me: Son of man, this is the place of my throne, the place for the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the sons of Israel for ever. The House of Israel, they and their kings, shall no more defile my sacred Name with their idolatry, and with the corpses of their kings by putting their threshold near my threshold, and their door-posts alongside of my door-posts, with only a wall between me and them, thus defiling my sacred Name by the abominations which they committed, for which reason I destroyed them in my anger. Now, let them remove their idolatry and the corpses of their kings from me, then I will dwell in the midst of them for ever.

The residence of Ezekiel in Babylonia gave him access to many new ideas and artistic forms; and his wide outlook over affairs is reflected in the elaborate descriptions of foreign nations which make his book a storehouse of antiquarian material. Ezekiel shows more learning than any other of the great prophets. His commentator must needs follow him: and Professor Haupt has added much cuneiform detail to Professor Toy's own notes. These are condensed into 115 pages, in which, however, the illustrative cuts take a good share. Whether the reconstruction of the cherub-chariot (p. 95) will help many readers, may be doubted: a clearer exposition of the symbolism of the divine attributes of omnipresence and omniscience might have been of more avail. Very interesting is Professor Toy's high estimate of Ezekiel's value as thinker and teacher. In a few brief but pregnant paragraphs he depicts him as standing at the crisis of the national religious life; he finds in him a man capable of discerning the essential need of his people and responding to it; in accepting for him the title "Father of Judaism" he signifies his belief that Ezekiel wrought for his people a work indispensable for their stage of religious development; and he even calls him "perhaps the most interesting personality in the great group of Prophets." It is plain that he is not terrified by the bugbear of legalism; and in his exposition of the so-called "theodicy" in chapter xxxvi. he fully recognises the affinity of the announcement of the "new heart" with the New Testament doctrine of regeneration. Full justice is thus done to the double aspect of religion as presented by the prophet—a religion of holy law and devout service on the one hand, and on the other of exalted apprehension through the "spirit" of those statutes of the conscience and the heart by which alone men could "live."

The admirable "Outline of the History of the Literature of the Old Testament," originally added by Dr. Kautzsch to the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures which he edited with the co-operation of a group of eminent modern scholars, has been rendered into generally excellent English by the practised hand of Dr.

John Taylor.* In 166 pages Kautzsch contrives to give a summary of the growth of the Old Testament books from the age of primitive song and legend to the latest products of devotional piety and philosophic speculation. The sketch is founded on the reconstruction of the religious history of Israel, which has been the work of the last thirty years. The chronological method adopted enables the author to keep clearly before his readers the growth of Israel's thought and life; and though the treatment of particular books is necessarily brief, skilful condensation permits of frequent indication of the chief grounds of critical judgment. Least satisfactory, perhaps, is the brief account of Isaiah ("Trite-Isaiah," p. 56, should of course be Trito-Isaiah), where the historic and other problems are too complicated to be treated within the author's limits. A somewhat conservative judgment puts Ecclesiastes as far back as the middle of the third century B.C.; on the other hand, the third collection in the Psalter (xc-cl.) is brought down to the time of Simon, the founder of the Asmonean dynasty, 142 B.C. or later. Excellent chronological tables, an analytical survey of the constituents of the books from Genesis to Kings (as well as Ezra and Nehemiah), and other illustrative material, together with a helpful index, make up a volume distinguished by breadth of knowledge, sobriety of judgment, and deep sympathy with the spirit of the Old Testament Scriptures.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

THE public examinations were held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday last, and were well attended by subscribers and friends. During the day sermons were preached by Messrs. Rossington, Nazarian, and Davison (students of the College), and answers to examination papers were read as usual. Much ground has been covered during the course of the session, and the students gave evidence of having a good grip of the subjects dealt with. When the visitor, the Rev. J. E. Odgers, delivered his address at five o'clock, there was an unusually large gathering. The following is an epitome of the address:—

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

In the first place I congratulate all interested in this College on the increased number of students, and I cannot but note the increased number of those who present themselves to take the whole academic course and to graduate in the Victoria University. No one can be sorry for this as long as there is still an open door for the sort of student contemplated by the founders of the Home Missionary Board. You know what was in their minds, though, perhaps, you can hardly realise what an awakening of mind on the part of the working man marked the period from 1830 to 1850; and in those times of the first cheap literature, the palmy days of Mechanics Institutes, there was also a spread of theological interest amongst the working classes. Where there had been religious earnestness and activity before, there was a desire to know the why and wherefore of religious beliefs. There was a secularism, too, which simply revolted against an old faith, and another more serious form of it which meant a genuine one-world-at-a-time effort to deal with existing evils. But I am dealing with the religious interest. Look at the societies of the Christian Brethren, at the influence of Joseph Barker. What was wanted was a plain story and a credible faith still anchored in the Bible, and the answer to give to those who asked. But these men wanted to hear the faith they had hammered out for themselves put into words, illustrated, and defended by those who had some ability in such matters. Here was the opportunity which the Missionary Associations of Lancashire and the founders of the Home Missionary Board endeavoured to seize. We know what the Board attempted and what it did. But I only dwell on these former days for purposes of contrast. Times are changed, and it is natural that with them an institution that was expressly intended to meet the wants of a time should change too. The congregations to which the students of those days were welcomed are not what they were. It looks in some cases as if the spice of originality had gone out with the generation which initiated them, and the religious interest which then was dominant has not been a leading feature in the recent developments of popular education. The Churches have been largely secularised (I do not use this term as one of indiscriminate reproach) in two ways at least.

(1.) The more serious secularist of fifty years ago is now represented by the socialist within the Church. I am very glad he is there; but I say that the spread of interest mainly socialistic when regarded as the thing which Churches as Churches are good for must tend to secularise the functions of the Church, to banish the ideal sanctions of conduct, and to make the flow of devotion thin and cold.

(2.) Though no one can be more glad than I when the Church is made a centre of social life, or from the associations of the Sunday the school runs its activities into the week-day, yet I think the institutions which nowadays grow up around both ought to include more definitely religious opportunities and agencies. I feel sometimes the absence of anything that shall let the young know that their elders feel as much about religion as they do, or that the minister has it as much at heart as he has.

Turn now to the changes in this institution: I still hope that the "grace-taught" man will not fail us; but there is no doubt that the prefixing to the theological education of this place for the majority of the students of a course of academic study is in response to a demand made by the congregations. You cannot but be aware that you are judged by quite humble people in the congregations to which you occasionally preach, by standards which could not possibly have obtained in the same places fifty years ago. It is obvious that you must take care that when tried by these standards your ministry be not condemned. All this means that the curriculum does not present the same chance to the man who comes to study after some years of business employment as for the younger man, whose schooling is fresh in his mind; and this means that to the latter the ministry will rather appear as the object of a worthy ambition than as a mission to which he has an unmistakable call. I trust things will not be made too hard for him. An earnest and unselfish purpose may well be deemed essential, but we should not tempt the young mind to put too spiritual an interpretation upon a natural preference; or be too ready to represent to the candidate for the ministry that he does not know what he is undertaking and the sacrifice and patience that will be demanded of him. I can think of very few instances where, when the ministry has been the young man's straight first choice among possible professions, he has turned away from it or been lightly daunted by difficulties or discouragements. In conclusion, I would say that you are opposing what I conceive to be the true idea of a church if you wish to get into vogue or position or influence by hooking your church to the tail of some other movement or interest. Again, remember that the centre of gravity of congregational life is in congregational worship, and, thirdly, I would beg you to use your heads as to ways and means of introducing a due element of seriousness into the young people's institutions that are grouped around our churches. Learn what others are doing in this way; but remember that in dealing with the young an ounce of originality is worth a pound of imitation, and that no ready-made system will fit all cases.

The Principal, the Rev. A. GORDON, announced that Mr. Shroeder had passed his M.A. examination, Mr. Vaughan had taken his B.A., and Mr. S. Jones had passed his preliminary (Victoria University). At the Owens College Examinations Mr. Dawtry, Mr. Worthington, and Mr. Thompson had taken prizes in preliminary Greek, intermediate Greek and intermediate Latin respectively. In the H.M.C. examinations Mr. Rossington had taken both the Sharpe Prize and the Greek Prize. Certificates were presented to Messrs. Vaughan and Nazarian, who had completed their course; the former, who holds the Tate scholarship, goes on to Oxford.

In the evening a valedictory service was held in Cross street Chapel, when the singing was led by the Oldham choir, and the Rev. W. G. TARRANT delivered an address:—

It would be obviously unbecoming, he said, to give on that occasion the kind of address suitable for the opening of a session. Their chief object that evening was to seek refreshment of heart and mind; and probably the students for the ministry would rather seek that refreshment in the contemplation of active work after leaving College, than in thinking on the subject of "Preparation for the Ministry." He would urge them, however, to be patient, and to take his assurance that by quiet and manly perseverance in their College studies they would be on the best path towards a happy and useful ministerial life. Commending to them the special branches of study suitable for their work as teachers and religious helpers of their fellow-men,

* Some slips and inelegances are, of course, inevitable: thus, p. 14, "if, after all, that we cannot prove," where that is meaningless; p. 67, "such ethical delicacy that an evangelical strain in this legislation has been quite justifiably spoken of"—a clumsy phrase; p. 146, the comma after opera operata spoils the sentence; p. 150†, "the only once used name" follows too closely "des nur einmal vorkommenden Namens"; p. 154, "his (the poet's, not Job's) speech displays its most impressive force at the end of the poem in the speeches of Jahweh," where the German certainly has rede twice, but in the first case the equivalent is obviously "language."

he would rather point to the development of character in the course of this discipline as the best thing their College could give them. They would feel the need hereafter of the faculty of "intending their mind," as Sir Isaac Newton phrased it, of controlling their powers and bringing them to bear on each duty in turn. In other departments of life they saw illustrious examples of whole-hearted surrender to the work men undertook to do. The ministry, certainly, asked no less for its highest success than the arts in which men rose to efficiency and excellence only by sedulous industry and application. This was the "strait gate" through which they must pass if they would attain to "life," and become not unworthy to be called the true leaders and prophets of the churches, servants of the truth, and apostles of Christ.

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

The annual proceedings at the close of the session concluded on Wednesday, June 28, in presence of a numerous gathering. The deputation from the Presbyterian Board consisted of Mr. Harold Bailly, and the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., and G. D. Hicks, M.A., Ph. D., who also officiated as examiners in conjunction with Mr. Talfourd Ely, M.A., London, and Professor D. Tyssul Evans, M.A., B.Sc., Cardiff.

Dr. Hicks occupied the chair, and, in his opening remarks, expressed the deep gratitude of every member of the Presbyterian Board to the Professors of the College for their unwearying efforts at that place. As an old fellow-student of Professor Weatherall's, he was glad to congratulate him on the result of his first year's work at Carmarthen. Speaking on behalf of the examiners, he believed they were well satisfied with the way in which the work had been done. He had had extremely good papers in ethics, logic, and the philosophy of religion—much better than he had received last year. He would impress upon them, however, the desirability of giving more attention to the study of Psychology. As theological students, they would be a good deal concerned with the manner in which the human mind attained to the knowledge of God, and, therefore, they should first become familiar with the human mind and with the way in which it attained to any knowledge at all. It was a great mistake to think that as students they were not dealing with practical things. The term "practical" was often a deadly word, applied to discourage consideration of those ideal ends of life, which alone made life worth living. Certainly in that sense Jesus Christ was the most unpractical of men. But the great themes of God, Duty and Immortality, were really the most practical of problems. He heartily welcomed into the ministry those students who were leaving the College. They were entering it at a momentous time. The past half century had been a period of criticism and upheaval. In his early student days he thought the work of scientific sceptics like Huxley and Tyndall would result in a tremendous gain to our Free Churches, and that the great bulwark of Authority would at last have to give way. That prognostication had not turned out to be true. Men had had their convictions shaken; but this had not resulted in large numbers going over from the Church of England and joining the Nonconformist Churches of this country. The result had been quite the contrary. He believed that the revival of Neo-Catholicism might be directly traced to that sceptical movement from which he in his early student days had hoped for so much. And for this reason. A sceptical age was always a credulous age. It was impossible for the human mind to rest in a system of negations, and if men came to distrust their normal healthy rational powers they inevitably sought support for religious convictions elsewhere. Take the case of Cardinal Newman. So far as Newman's philosophic position was concerned, he was as much a sceptic as either Huxley or Tyndall. He doubted the possibility of reason reaching any knowledge of the divine reality. Probability, he said, was the guide of life; and how could probability furnish any ground for certitude in religious belief? Consequently, he was driven to find such ground in an external authority. And to all intents and purposes that was the position of the High Church party now, and need he add of Mr. A. J. Balfour, the leader of the House of Commons—the advocate of philosophic doubt and the upholder of ecclesiastical tradition. This veneration for authority was he was sorry, to say, not confined to the Roman or the Anglican Churches. He had known such a thing even in Nonconformist chapels. He had no personal experience of the matter himself; but he knew of chapels in the country in which there were tokens of a desire to become priests amongst the laity. It was an ugly business when in a little congregation half-a-dozen people were all aspiring to the chair of St. Peter. He mentioned these things as evidencing the movement of the age which had driven numbers of people into Roman Catholicism. It had also produced results more unfortunate in driving a large number of people into absolute indifference in regard to religious matters. He did not suppose three-fourths of the people of London attended any place of worship at all. They were not theoretical sceptics. They did not give themselves any trouble to think about religious matters. In their pastoral work in the future, the students would have to come into contact with both these phases of thought. And there was now a splendid opportunity for the free Nonconformist theologian. They must show the human mind to be capable of a knowledge of God and duty and immortality, and instead of the infallibility of Pope, Church or Book, must proclaim the infallibility of truth when established by reason, of duty revealed to conscience, and love when it burnt with the enthusiasm of humanity.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT referred to the subjects of ecclesiastical history and English literature, in which he had examined, and particularly advised the students to make themselves acquainted with the best literature, as really a very considerable embodiment of the religious spirit of the nation. He spoke highly of the sermons he had heard, and advised the students to give a good deal of time to the study of great preachers.

MR. HAROLD BAILLY advised young ministers to avail themselves of opportunities for entering municipal life, where they might render much good service. He counselled that more attention should be given to Hygiene, in which he had examined.

MR. TALFOURD ELY commented favourably on the classical work of the session, and the PRINCIPAL read a favourable report from Professor Tyssul Evans on the Hebrew work, and altogether expressed himself as highly gratified with the result of the examinations.

The prize and bursary list was then read, including the Sharpe prizes for excellence in Biblical knowledge. Ordinary certificates on leaving College were given to five students, and certificates of honour to two others. A telegram of hearty greeting was sent to the Rev. T. L. Marshall, for many years Visitor and Secretary of the Board, and subsequently, but too late to be read at the meeting, the letter was received from him referred to in our "Notes of the Week."

Speeches were also made by Professors JONES and WEATHERALL and the Rev. E. U. THOMAS, an old student.

The proceedings closed with prayer by the Rev. S. HARRIES, of London, and the singing of "Old Land of my Fathers."

EASTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE annual meeting of this Union was held at Braintree on Monday, the 3rd inst., when delegates from all the districts affiliated to the Union assembled. It is now some four years since the Union held its meeting at Braintree, when the present new church was inaugurated. Now, as then, the same cordial welcome was extended to the members by Mr. and Mrs. Courtauld, and attention to the visitors by Mr. and Mrs. Fuller. Among those present were—Miss Tagart (representing B. and F.U.A. and Central Postal Mission, London), Mrs. Mottram, Messrs. H. E. Blazeby (treasurer), I. M. Wade, S. C. Sothorn, Norwich; Mr. J. G. Notcutt, (president), Rev. W. Jellie, M.A. (hon. sec.), Mr. R. Hambling, Ipswich; Revs. H. Lawson, Diss; J. Dale, Bury St. Edmunds; G. Lansdown, King's Lynn; J. A. Brinkworth, Saffron Walden; E. John Harry, Chelmsford; and Messrs. B. H. Wood, Smith, Williment, of Braintree, Ipswich and Yarmouth.

Members and friends having been entertained to luncheon by Mr. and Mrs. Courtauld, the annual business meeting was held in the church, Mr. J. G. Notcutt, President, in the chair. In the course of his remarks, the President expressed his regret at the resignation of the Rev. E. M. Daplyn at Norwich. They could not be satisfied with the progress their cause was making. They were wanting in the full realisation of the faith that was in them. If they could only express themselves with the warmth which attracted others, and which their faith demanded, they should be nearer the realisation of their hopes.

The hon. secretary, the Rev. W. JELLIE, then read the report of the executive committee. The report dwelt on the important changes which had taken place during the past year, particularly noticing the resignation of the late secretary Mr. J. D. Wright, and of Miss Barmby of the Postal Mission. In Mr. Wright they had one who took his full share of the work the Union entailed, always earnest in maintaining and extending the cause for which the Union stands. Miss Barmby, the first secretary of the Postal Mission in this district, rendered most efficient service at its inauguration in 1889. As Miss Barmby's successor, it had the good fortune to secure the services of Miss S. S. Dowson, of Geldeston. The vacant pulpit at Bury St. Edmunds had been filled since January last by the Rev. John Dale, while at Yarmouth the void created by the retirement of the Rev. Roger Smyth remained to be filled; and, again, at Norwich the pulpit was vacant through the removal of the Rev. Edgar Daplyn to Hampstead. All these changes made the future of the churches in East Anglia a matter of deep concern, and the Committee could not but feel that the task would call for all the energy, time, and money at the command of the Union to strengthen and assist liberal Christianity in the district. Mr. R. H. Fuller having left Halstead to reside at Braintree, the services at the former place were necessarily discontinued, but a plan of fortnightly preachers had been arranged for a time, the B. and F.U.A., the Union, and Halstead people all contributing. Help in the form of a grant had been given to King's Lynn, and a point had been made of having every church, or centre of work, personally visited by some member of the Committee during the year. Exchanges of ministers had been effected between Norwich, Ipswich, Braintree and Lynn. Meetings of the executive had been followed by congregational meetings and a stimulus given to the churches thus visited. The Committee were not content with merely assisting existing congregations, but were desirous of efforts to establish fresh ones. The report dwelt on the desirability of a lay-preachers' union being formed.

The SECRETARY then read the reports of the various churches in connection with the Union—Norwich, Lynn, Diss, Hapton, Braintree.

The treasurer, Mr. H. E. BLAZEY, read his report, by which it appeared that the income for the year was £79—the balance remaining in hand, £7. The Treasurer appealed strongly to members to increase their subscriptions and to those not yet enrolled on the books as members, to become so; and thus strengthen his hands and the work of the Union generally.

Miss COURTAULD read the report of the district Postal Mission for Miss Dowson, which showed an income of £10 8s., and balance in hand at the close of the year of £5 5s.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, the reports as read were adopted and ordered to be printed under the direction of the executive.

The Rev. J. DALE moved that the best thanks of the Union be given to the President, officers, and the executive for their services during the past year.

Mr. J. G. NOTCUTT was then re-elected President, the other officers were re-elected, and the Committee appointed.

Miss TAGART (London) spoke of the work done at Framlingham and Bedford, where the services had been well attended, and said they were well satisfied with the work done by Mr. Amey, for whom £120 had been secured, and to whom a vote of sympathy on the loss of his wife was passed.

Mr. I. M. WADE moved that a hearty welcome be accorded to Miss Tagart as representing the B. and F.U.A., the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth as representing the General

Baptist Assembly, and the Rev. E. J. Harry, of Chelmsford. He had been much struck with the remark made by the President that they made no progress, wanting the enthusiasm their glorious creed demanded.

Mr. SMITH (Ipswich) said, in seconding the motion, he felt on coming into the Unitarian Church, the lack of that spirit which would attract others within its fold; their aim should be to uplift humanity.

The Rev. J. A. BRINKWORTH, in responding, said never till now had he been invited to Braintree. Speaking for the body of General Baptists, they had the heartiest sympathy of that community. He could not understand why Saffron Walden was left out of the Union. Joseph Barker said: "Give me Unitarian teaching and Methodist heartiness." They must always regard Saffron Walden people as friends.

On the motion of Mrs. MOTTRAM, it was agreed that the heartiest thanks of the Union be given to the congregation and minister of Braintree for their hospitable entertainment.

At six o'clock a public service was conducted, in which the Rev. J. Dale read the lessons, and Mr. R. H. Fuller gave a short address from Matt. v. 8, "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God"—on "Communion with God." "Communion," he said, "was a state, not a proposition. Just as God could not be expressed in words, we had a sense of God's presence with us. He comes to us in the life of humanity, and in some scenes of nature in moments of ecstasy. Every one had felt this ecstasy."

After tea a public meeting was held in the church. The chair was taken by Mr. R. H. FULLER, who expressed his pleasure at seeing the delegates of the Union at Braintree, and extended a welcome to them.

Mr. I. M. WADE responded, and said he hoped these meetings would result in some good, and that action would follow their deliberations.

The hon. secretary, Rev. W. JELLIE, reviewed the work of the Union, and spoke of the difficulties attending the overlooking some twelve or thirteen scattered churches, representing an area of 450 miles. Every place was of some value, and they had to take into consideration the conditions of each church. Miss Tagart followed Mr. Jellie in his sketch of the progress of the Union. In these districts they were so isolated—the B. and F.U.A. looked in every case to see how much local spirit was exerted—they should never let small congregations collapse or their buildings go to decay for want of a little womanly care. Miss TAGART next spoke of the Central Postal Mission work. She urged that they should interest Sunday-school children in the work of Postal Missions. The late secretary, Miss Barmby, was remarkable for her power and literary capacity. Miss Tagart concluded her remarks by urging on all to support the "Eastern Union" and the Postal Mission.

The Rev. G. LANSDOWN, of Lynn, spoke on "The Advantages and Disadvantages of Religious Isolation," and Mrs. JAMES MOTTRAM, of Norwich, read an admirable paper on "The Importance of Expression Corresponding with Conviction," or rather, as Mrs. Mottram wished to phrase it, "the importance of translating our convictions into action."

The paper was listened to with marked attention, and it is hoped that in some form it may reach a larger circle than those to whom it was addressed. The last subject on the agenda, "To Think Deeply, a Man must Think Freely," was to have been spoken to by Mr. C. Fenton, of London, as representative of the B. and F.U.A., but at the last moment Mr. Fenton was prevented from attending.

The meeting was addressed by Mr. B. H. WOODS, of Braintree, and others.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ainsworth.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, who on that day entered on his duties as minister of the congregation. In the afternoon his subject was "The Religious Training of our Children," and in the evening "The Place of the Church in Modern Life." Anthems were sung by the choir, under the direction of Mr. A. H. Evans, organist and schoolmaster, and solos by Miss Hilton (of Leyland) and Master Basil Sellars. Both services were very successful, the chapel being crowded in the evening. Collections were taken amounting to £40 11s. 7d.

Birmingham.—On Sunday last; the 2nd inst., the annual flower services were held at Hurst-street Mission, Mr. W. J. Clarke officiating, and delivering an address in the morning on "Flowers as Preachers of Beauty"; in the afternoon on "Flowers as Preachers of Hope"; and in the evening on "Flowers as Preachers of Love," the chapel being filled at all three services by large congregations. The large numbers of gifts of flowers received from members of the various mission agencies enabled the willing workers to arrange an exceedingly beautiful and effective chapel decoration, the special music, including Gounod's "Send out Thy Light," being very effectively rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. R. A. Clarke, the organist.

Coseley.—The centenary of the Sunday-school connected with the Old Meeting House was celebrated last Sunday, the preacher morning and evening being the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, of London, and in the afternoon the Rev. H. Austin, an old scholar of the school. Three special hymns, written by the Rev. Henry Eachus, minister of the chapel, were sung in the course of the services. On Monday the ministers of the district were entertained to luncheon in the schoolroom, after which the usual ministers' meeting was held. After tea, which was largely attended, a public meeting was held in the church. Among those present were the Revs. H. Eachus, L. P. Jacks, J. C. Street, H. McKean, J. Howard, J. H. Mathews, W. F. Turland, A. A. Charlesworth, I. Wrigley, J. Harrison, E. D. Priestley Evans, W. J. B. Tranter, and A. H. Shelley. Speeches were delivered in praise of the good work done by the school, from which men had gone out to fill prominent places in different parts of the world. Testimony was also borne to the good service rendered by the Rev. H. Eachus, who for thirty-four years had laboured at Coseley. A medal, bearing on one side a portrait of Mr. Eachus, was also issued in commemoration of the centenary.

Ditchling.—Anniversary services were held last Sunday, conducted by the Rev. J. Harwood, of Brixton. The morning sermon was from the text, "By their fruits ye shall know them"; the evening was on "Fellow-labourers with God." Visitors from Brighton, Horsham, Chichester, Guildford, and other places joined in the services, 61 friends being present at tea before the evening service.

Dundee.—The Rev. H. Williamson had a conference recently with the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Dundee on the subject of a proposed labour bureau for working girls. In addition to the bureau Mr. Williamson urged the importance of establishing a lodging-house where girls homeless or strangers in the city might find shelter, and where those who desired it might have some training in domestic economy. He had himself interviewed several thousands of girls, while he had carried on a labour bureau on his own account, and he knew how greatly such help was needed. The proposal received the sympathetic attention of the magistrates, and it is likely soon to be carried out.

Eastbourne.—The Rev. George St. Clair, having conducted the services in Lismore-road during the last three months, has consented to a renewed and longer engagement. On Sunday last Mr. Taylor, on behalf of the congregation, spoke some words of welcome. Eastbourne society ignores the existence of Unitarians in the town; but the newspapers have already noticed some of Mr. St. Clair's discourses.

Evesham.—A memorial window has been placed in the Oat-street Chapel, together with the following inscription:—"To the memory of the Rev. David Davis (son of the Rev. Timothy Davis) and Minna his wife, this window is dedicated by their children." The window is of coloured glass, by Messrs. Eaton and Bulfield, of Lancaster.

Gateshead.—On Sunday last the anniversary of the Sunday-school was a great success, the celebration taking the form of a flower service, and the hall was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers, kindly given by friends, and large congregations assembled afternoon and evening. The Rev. H. Bodel Smith, of Darlington, gave the afternoon address, and delivered an eloquent discourse at the evening service. Mr. H. Sutcliffe, school superintendent, is to be congratulated upon his success in training the scholars, who sang to the delight of all present. The flower service was that published by the Sunday School Association.

Heaton Moor.—On Saturday last, July 1, an enjoyable garden party was held in the grounds of Priestnall Hey, Heaton Mersey, the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Hans Renold, the occasion being a welcome to the Rev. Priestley Prime to the Heaton Moor Unitarian congregation. There were about 105 guests present. Mr. Ashworth welcomed Mr. Prime on behalf of the congregation; further welcome was offered by the Rev. George Knight, president of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, on behalf of the Association, the Rev. S. Alfred Steinthal, on behalf of the Unitarian ministers of the Manchester district. The Rev. Dendy Agate spoke as late Superintendent Missionary of the Forward Movement Churches. The Rev. P. R. Batehan, minister of the Congregational Church, Heaton Moor, and the Rev. W. R. Stewart, minister of the Wesleyan Chapel, Heaton Moor, were present; also Mr. Alderman Harry Rawson, Mr. Councillor Marsden, Dr. C. H. Herford, Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, Revs. P. M. Higginson, Charles Roper, W. H. Burgess, G. Evans, W. E. Atack, J. Ruddle, T. B. Broadrick, and others.

Horwich.—A very successful garden party was held at Montcliffe, the residence of Mr. C. E. Barr, on Saturday afternoon and evening, June 24. Tea was very kindly provided by Mr. and Mrs. Barr. The proceeds were in aid of the Bazaar Funds. The day was fine, and very extensive views were to be had. The Ribble Estuary, Lytham Point, the Towers at Blackpool and New Brighton could be clearly seen.

Nantwich.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 25, when special hymns were sung by the children. The Rev. J. Morley Mills preached morning and evening, and in the afternoon Miss Montgomery of Chester gave an address to the children at a special service.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual picnic was held at Stalybridge on Saturday last, but was marred by the heavy storm which passed over the district during the morning. Tea should have been held at "The Brushies," but the weather preventing this, it was held in the schools, about 170 teachers and friends sitting down. After tea a party of fifty or sixty ventured on through the woodlands to "The Brushies," the remainder after an interval assembling in the schools, where a social party was held. Music, singing, and dancing passed the time pleasantly, and during the evening the President (the Rev. W. Harrison) gave those present a little serious reminder, asking them never to allow Saturday nights' pleasure to interfere with Sunday duty. A cordial vote of thanks to the Stalybridge friends and chairman was carried on the motion of the Rev. T. R. Elliott, seconded by Mr. W. Lawton.

Norwich.—We are glad to learn that the Rev. E. M. Daplyn was well enough to leave Lowestoft, where he has been staying to recruit his health, to give his farewell service at the Octagon Chapel last Sunday morning. He gave a most impressive and beautiful parting address, and the members afterwards crowded round him in the vestry to bid him a regretful farewell, accompanied with the most cordial good wishes for his success and increased usefulness as colleague to the Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford at Hampstead. A few parting words on behalf of the congregation to this effect were said by a member of the congregation, expressive of the hope that the bond of affectionate interest which had been created between minister and congregation during his three years' stay amongst them would not be entirely severed, but that many opportunities would occur when they would see his face amongst them again. The congregation, as a fitting close to the service, expressed their farewell by singing that touching and beautiful parting hymn of Newton's, "As the sun's enlivening eye."

Pontypridd.—The seventh anniversary was celebrated in the Old Town Hall on Sunday, July 2, when the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., of Cardiff, was the preacher. The evening service was well attended, many strangers being present. At the close of the afternoon service Mr. Davis baptised the infant daughter of the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, minister of the church.

Poole.—The anniversary and flower services were held on Sunday, June 25, the sermons being preached by the Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A., B.D. The church was prettily decorated, and the special music included Farmer's "Te Deum" and Caleb Simper's anthem, "I will feed my flock." The collections were on behalf of the Sunday-school.

Tavistock.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. John Barron, on Sunday, June 25. At the evening service the church was filled. On Wednesday, June 28, the Sunday-school treat was held at Sampford Spiney, one of the most charming spots on Dartmoor. It was to this place, the founder of the congregation, Thomas Larkham, took his followers and preached to them, when the new vicar entered on his duties at the Parish Church, Whit-Sunday, 1661.

Todmorden.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held last Sunday, conducted by the Rev. A. W. Fox, who preached three times during the day. Anthems were rendered by the choir, and special hymns were sung by the children. The collections amounted to £42 3s. The July Calendar of the church contains a full report of the proceedings at the memorial stone-laying of the new school building on June 17. The stone was laid by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester, a friend of the congregation for the last fifty years, and of the Fielden family. The stone bore an inscription to the memory of Samuel, John and Joshua Fielden. Mr. John Ashton Fielden wrote a letter to Mr. Steinthal on the occasion of the stone-laying, enclosing a cheque for £200 towards the building fund. At the evening meeting it was stated that the building contracts for the new schools amounted to £1,290, and contributions had been received of £1,295, but there was the further cost of heating apparatus, furnishing, &c., to be met. During the evening the fund was raised to £1,300.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

We published last week a further list of donations to the London Permanent Chapel-Building Fund, bringing the total so far received up to £7,717. Too late to be included in that list, a donation to the fund was received from Dr. Martineau, which will therefore appear in the next list. We thus have the happiness of knowing that in this effort we are sustained by the sympathy of our revered teacher, and we may hope that his example will prevail with any of our friends who may hitherto have hesitated to throw themselves heartily into the movement.

The first editorial note in the Christian Register of June 29 reads as follows :—

"Charles Carroll Everett, D.D., LL.D., Dean of the Cambridge Divinity School and Bussey Professor of Theology, came last week to the age of seventy years. The event was happily celebrated by an assemblage of pupils and old friends at Hotel Vendome in Boston. No reporters were present, and therefore, the many wise, witty, and friendly remarks concerning Dr. Everett's character and career will be unrecorded. But the opinions of the friends who gathered about the Dean that evening would neither add to nor detract from the reputation which he has made during thirty years of service. As he himself happily phrased it, it has been his good fortune to work at the time of a revolution in religious thought second only to the reformation of Luther or even to the beginning of Christianity itself. In this great change the Church has passed from the letter to the spirit. Dr. Everett is one of the first among those who have happily, wisely, and tenderly guided the thoughts of youth in the new channels besides shaping the thoughts and plans of those who have been the active leaders in the forward movement of religion throughout the world."

In this country, also, there are many grateful readers of Dr. Everett's books, who owe to him much stimulus to thought and fresh insight into the deep things of the spirit. Their birthday greetings and congratulations, though unspoken and belated, will be none the less sincere.

THE South African News, of June 19, contained a sermon preached by the Rev. Ramsden Balmforth in the Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church at Cape Town, on "The Transvaal: Peace or War?" The sermon contained an earnest appeal to both sides in the present conflict of interests or supposed interests, to put themselves in the other's place, and went on to show how patience and reasonable conciliation must work out the solution. War for such a cause would be an intolerable iniquity, and would postpone for a generation the accomplishment of a dream that many people cherished, of the United States of South Africa, while it would increase race hatred tenfold. And the sermon concluded :—

Let me implore everyone of you to rise above the waves of purely partisan feeling, and to approach the discussion of your differences in a reasonable spirit. We profess to acknowledge the paramount authority of reason; how long then are we going to favour the prevalence of brute force? How long are we going to stimulate the instincts of the wolf and tiger as against the divine faculties of human nature? How long is the religion of human brotherhood to be a mere phrase on our lips? Let me ask you to divest your minds of prejudice and your hearts from passion, that the spirit of righteousness and love may so clear our minds and widen our sympathies that we may keep back the clouds of war and assist the angel of peace to extend the dominion and strength and solidity of her helpful reign.

MRS. HICKSON, hon. secretary of the Women's Armenian Relief Fund, and Miss Cantlow, of the "Friends of Armenia," have both recently appealed for additional funds for the Industrial Bureau and the Orphanage at Van, under the direction of Dr. Raynolds. Writing towards the end of May, when abundant rains had fallen, Dr. Raynolds was hopeful of the coming harvest, but there was still much need of help until it should be gathered in, and many children had to be refused admission to the Orphanage because of the lack of funds. Mrs. Hickson writes :—

Dr. Raynolds most gratefully acknowledges the receipt of sums amounting to £250 sent from our Committee during May. This brings our remittances up to £1,200 this year, whilst since our work began in the spring of 1895 we have received and transmitted on behalf of the Industrial Bureau, Orphanages, and free aid, the sum of £17,645.

We tender most heartfelt thanks to our kind friends for thus giving us the means to continue this work, and earnestly implore them to continue to support us.

The Armenians are possessed of wonderful recuperative power, and continued peace in the province, a few good harvests, and the gradual resumption of business, would soon place the bulk of the people above the necessity of outside alms. If the Industrial Bureau could be placed on a permanent basis, so as to furnish continued employment to the women and help to the children, there would be satisfactory reason for hope that the future of these poor, patient, suffering creatures was to a certain extent provided for.

There are now 500 children in the Van Orphanages, and the annual cost of maintenance is £5 per child. Donations to the Women's Armenian Relief Fund may be sent to Mrs. Madeleine Cole, 1, Trebovir-road, Earl's-court, S.W., and to the "Friends of Armenia," to Hector Munro Ferguson, Esq., 47, Victoria-street, Westminster, S.W.

At the meetings of the National United Temperance Council, held in London last week, the Essex Hall Temperance Association was represented by its treasurer, Mr. F. A. Edwards, who has been good enough to send us some notes of the meetings. The idea of the Council was to bring together in conference representatives of all the religious bodies and national and sectional temperance organisations of various kinds, and that aim appears to have been amply attained. The business sessions were held in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, and commenced on the Monday evening with a conversazione and reception of visitors by the president, Mr. A. F. Hills, D.L. Among the speakers were Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., and Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., the only teetotal member of the present Government. A conference on the following day dealt with Brewster Sessions work, and showed how much can be done in the reduction of the number of licenses even in the existing state of the law.

WEDNESDAY was the great day of the week, when the National United Temperance Fête was attended by some 27,000 teetotalers. One of the most noteworthy gatherings of the day was a breakfast, of vegetarian viands only, to twenty-seven of the thirty-two teetotal Mayors of the country. Encouraging speeches were made by the Lord Mayor of Sheffield (Alderman Clegg), who is a life-long abstainer, and several other of the Mayors, all of whom have had the courage of their convictions and have excluded alcoholic liquors from their civic entertainments. On Thursday a conference on the Sunday closing question showed that much good work had been done, including the presentation of a great memorial to Lord Salisbury, signed by 18,500 bishops, clergy, and ministers of all denominations. Of these, 10,874 represented the Church of England, 3,293 the Methodist Churches, 1,945 Congregationalists and Countess of Huntingdon's connection, 1,361 Baptists, 525 Roman Catholics, 280 Presbyterians, and 169 Unitarians. These figures show that over 50 per cent. of the Church of England clergy signed, while in the case of some of the Nonconformist bodies the proportion was considerably over 90 per cent. Of Unitarians the percentage appears not to have been fifty. On the other hand, much evidence was given to show that while educated people often seem to hesitate over what they regard as an interference with individual liberty, the great majority of those most directly concerned are in favour of Sunday closing.

WESLEY'S CHAPEL, in the City-road, was re-opened on Friday week, after re-decorations, with some additional side-buildings added. These were opened by Sir John Lubbock, M.P., and the chapel itself by Lord Strathcona. At noon Dr. Parker preached an opening sermon, in the course of which he said that unless Christ were in the midst of Wesley's Chapel they might throw away their golden key and write "Ichabod" on the façade of the building. At a subsequent luncheon addresses were given by Mr. Asquith, M.P., Sir John Lubbock, and others. Mr. Asquith said that he spoke, not as a member of their religious communion, but with the freedom and, perhaps, the imperfect information of an outsider:—

So far as he knew, Methodism owed nothing to and claimed nothing from the Houses of Legislature, and there was nothing that Parliament could give them in the way either of endowment or of privilege which would tempt them to surrender their spiritual autonomy. In the free air and in the open field Methodism had not only held its own, but it had steadily added to its acquisitions and enlarged its borders. The place in which they were assembled they did well to honour. It belonged, not to a sect or cause, for although they as Wesleyans were its natural and appointed guardians, they held it in trust, not for Methodism only, but for England and for Christendom at large.

In the afternoon a memorial to the late Dr. Moulton, headmaster of the Leys School at Cambridge, was unveiled in the chapel by Sir H. H. Fowler, M.P., the President of the Conference presiding.

In this month's Contemporary Review Professor Dowden has an extremely interesting essay on "Puritanism and English Literature," beginning with a reference to the Elizabethan drama, and ending with Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, "the prose-epic of English Hebraism." Literature is further represented by the address on Lamb and Keats, delivered by Mr. Frederic Harrison at the unveiling of their portraits at the Passmore Edwards Free Library at Edmonton. Neither Lamb nor Keats, said Mr. Harrison, can claim a place in the very foremost ranks of our writers or poets. "Yet these two hold their own. There is no second Lamb; there is no other Keats." Canon Hicks, of Manchester, writes a very appreciative article in review of Rowntree and Sherwell's recent book on "The Temperance Problem and Social Reform." Only from the third chapter, criticising the policy of Prohibition he strongly dissents, and is doubtful whether municipalisation of the Drink Traffic would really have the advantages claimed for it. Dr. William Barry makes a vigorous defence of the Roman Catholic Church in "The Troubles of a Catholic Democracy—" vigorous but quite unconvincing; and a "Modern Catholic" writes a reply to a former article on "The Possibilities of a Catholic University." Politics in the Transvaal, in France and in Denmark and Germany, on which George Brandes writes, are dealt with in other articles, and Dr. Antonio G. Pérez pleads for the independence of Cuba.

PROFESSOR DOWDEN is represented also in the Nineteenth Century this month, by an article on "The English Masque," which will be read with special interest by those who were present at the performance of Milton's Comus last Saturday. The Countess of Aberdeen writes on the International Council of Women in Congress, strongly convinced as President, and from a wide experience, of the value of the movement. Miss Octavia Hill's article on "The Open Spaces of the Future" should be widely read. As regards children's playgrounds, she urges that they lose a great part of their value until some one is there to teach the little ones how to play and to keep good order; she also pleads that children should be taught gardening. And apart from towns the urgent need for securing scenes and sites in the open country for the rest and recreation of the people is dealt with.

"I am deeply convinced," Miss Hill writes, "that if our people are to have access in the years to come to some of the loveliest spots of their native land, if in the intervals of work they are to find rest in the beauty and the peace of nature, much will depend on some of us immediately devoting our best strength to seeing that certain places secured. From the London workman or clerk who spends his Saturday or Bank Holiday away from London, to the professional man who takes his family for a few weeks away for change, we are all dependent in having some accessible area of unappropriated space, whether it be the New Forest glades, or the Welsh mountains, or Tunbridge Wells, or Haslemere, or the sea-shore, or the by-ways and commons of Kent and Surrey."

And the article concludes with what the National Trust, which has been five years at work, had done to this end.

THE honorary freedom of the Borough of Northampton is to be conferred on Sir Philip Manfield. At the special meeting of the Council, when a resolution to that effect was adopted, fitting reference was made to the eminent services rendered by Sir Philip to Northampton since his settlement there in 1840. In 1866 he first entered the Council and served for various terms until 1892, as Councillor, Alderman, and Mayor, when on the death of Mr. Bradlaugh he was elected to represent the borough in Parliament, and sat for three years. In 1894 he was knighted. Closely associated with the staple industry of the town, Sir Philip has been a successful manufacturer and a very large employer of labour. One of the highest testimonies to his worth is found in the fact that in acute labour disputes he has commanded as arbitrator the confidence of both masters and men.

HAVING written the above note we were grieved to receive intelligence of the death of Lady Manfield, and to hear that Sir Philip himself is still seriously ill.

THE International Arbitration Association (40, Outer Temple) will publish immediately after the conclusion of the deliberations at The Hague, a short explanatory and critical account of the Peace Conference, with supplementary matter by Mr. Felix Moscheles, Mr. G. H. Perris, and other writers. The pamphlet will be published at sixpence, and will be the first of a series of Concord extras.

INLAND.

I.

The day has past into the west,
The yellow fields have yielded up their sheaves.

I hear the evening song of reapers
And the low of cattle gathering to the fold;
The soft leaves rustle, and the night-birds call;
And peace lies all across the land.

Father, I thank thee for it all,—
For the yellow harvest and the twilight rest;
For these peaceful valleys where men dwell
As in the hollow of thine hand!

II.

But, oh, to feel thy breath within the ocean's breeze;
To feel the salt spray dash upon my face;
To hear the sea-gull's cry and the deep surf roar;
To let my heart leap out with the rushing tide,
And my blood keep pace with the flowing wave;
To know again life's fulness and its joy;
To stand once more above the Golden Gate!

NEWBURY CHAPEL.

A MEETING was held at Newbury on Friday, July 7, for the purpose of inaugurating a fund for the renovation of the old chapel, known in the town as "the Presbyterian Chapel," and of waking fresh interest in the work of the congregation.

Service was held in the afternoon at 3 o'clock, conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, the sermon being preached by the Rev. H. SHAEN SOLLY, M.A., of Bridport.

The sermon, which we hope to print next week, dealt with the importance of a knowledge of the past history of religious life in this country, and traced in a most interesting manner the progressive development of the liberal Nonconformist churches.

EVENING MEETING.

After tea in the Temperance Hall, and a visit to the fine old parish church, the old Cloth Hall, the Town Hall, and other points of interest, a public meeting was held in the chapel. The chair was taken by Mr. W. COLFOX, High Sheriff of Dorset, and there were also present Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Mr. F. Maddison, M.P., Mrs. Suffield, Mrs. Shrubsole, the Revs. F. Allen, W. Lloyd, E. A. Voysey, and V. D. Davis, Messrs. Richard Eve, G. H. Chitty, J. Cogan Conway, C. Fenton, Gilbert, Bellman, Edwell, Stillman, and others. Letters of regret for non-attendance had been received from the Revs. Dr. Drummond, J. E. Odgers, A. N. Blatchford, F. W. Stanley, Miss Tagart, Messrs. F. Nettlefold, J. F. Schwann, and others.

The meeting having been opened with prayer, the CHAIRMAN said that their object was to inaugurate a fund for the renovation and decoration of that old chapel, and to inaugurate a better time for Unitarianism in Newbury. He hoped that in the work of restoration the chapel would not be spoilt, as so many churches and chapels had been. It was a typical seventeenth-century chapel, and it was a pleasure to see it in such good repair. He pleaded for the old lead windows, and wished it were possible to remove the stucco from the front and show the old bricks again.

Mr. T. A. STILLMAN, treasurer of the congregation, gave an interesting historical sketch of the chapel. The congregation had originated with the Rev. Benjamin Woodbridge, one of the first graduates of Harvard College, ejected from the parish church. He first conducted services in a private house in a neighbouring village, and in 1697 the chapel was licensed for public worship. After him James Pierce, of Exeter fame, was minister, and from that time no doctrinal subscription had been enforced in the congregation. The steps of theological progress were marked by the hymn-books used, from Dr. Watt's Hymns, to Dr. Martineau's and the Essex Hall Hymnal. An uncle of Dr. Martineau's had married a member of that congregation, and their eldest child was buried in the chapel burial-ground. With such a history the old chapel ought to be kept in tenable repair. Some years ago they had themselves spent a considerable sum in improvements; but that chapel he felt was the property not merely of the congregation, but of Protestant Nonconformists generally, and for its preservation they now felt that they must make a wider appeal. For cleaning, and to some extent beautifying the interior, £50 was needed, for an adequate heating apparatus another £50, and for the re-building of the vestry, of which the roof was no longer safe, and extending it to make a useful class-room and library, £150. Thus they asked for £250, and if there should be a surplus, they also wanted a new organ.

The collections made during the day amounted to £15 3s. 7d., and Sir John Brunner promised a further donation.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER then addressed the meeting. Having referred with pleasure to a previous visit to Newbury, on occasion of the bi-centenary, two years ago, and to that meeting as a healthy sign of life, he said that he came before them as one who was extremely thankful and proud of his training as a Unitarian, and he should be glad if he could persuade them to the same pride. As a body they were greatly remiss in that matter. He could wish that the history of their body in England were better known. It was extremely interesting to hear the history of one congregation, but still more important was the history of those who had fought for freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of conscience, and they should make it a matter of duty to teach it to their children. The fight for conscience sake was far more glorious and nobler than any fight for the extension of the Empire. A great deal was said at the present time about the necessity of teaching Church history. More than one society attached to the Established Church made a duty of teaching Church history. He should like to give them such a dose of it, of real and true Church history, that they should be filled with it to overflowing. After the history of the first most sacred time he would begin with the fight between Arius and Athanasius, and he would carry it on and on, showing how there had always been those who stood for the purity of the truth as Jesus taught it, and that the Unitarian protest had been most vigorous in the freest countries, while power and wealth and tyranny had been the mark of established Churches. The cold shoulder given to Unitarians they now looked upon with contempt, but there had been times when it was a more serious matter, and the history of those times ought to be thoroughly expounded to all who would listen. The more Unitarian doctrine was taught the better. He should like it to be taught how in the present century and especially during the last sixty or seventy years Unitarians had done excellent social and public work. It was interesting to note that the railways of England were practically made by Quakers and Unitarians. The lists of directors and secretaries and engineers were filled with their names. The energy of mind that made them Unitarians made them ready to accept every good thing offered to the public. He hoped that now, as in the past, from every Unitarian congregation there might go forth some light and leading in the direction of freedom and progress. There never was a time when the efforts of those who believed in freedom and progress were more needed than the present. Next year he thought the nation would have to declare itself on social and national subjects, and it was a matter for ardent hope, even of prayer, that when that great fight came, Unitarians might forget all lesser matters of difference, and be absolutely one, as they used to be.

The Rev. FREDERIC ALLEN congratulated the congregation on the progress which he noted since his last visit, and impressed upon them the need of faithfulness to the cause. Such a place as that recalled memories of old fidelity. Young people should know something of the history of religion in their country. Great changes had taken place in the theological teaching of other Churches, and more and more it was insisted that life and conduct were the touch-stone. They must be faithful in their own place.

Mr. F. MADDISON, M.P., spoke as a Unitarian in belief, and one who had been brought up in the strictest sect of orthodoxy, but then even against his own desire had been led into the only sect in Christendom that he knew of where there was absolute freedom. Coming straight out of the stress of a contested election at Oldham to that quiet retreat had been a delight to him, and especially when he heard the discourse on the principle of freedom, in which it was insisted that there was nothing that might come between the naked soul and God. That he felt to be religion. In that thought he found devotion and worship. That was the sort of feeling many like himself had in what they called the labour movement. Though they could always point to men in the social reform movement who had been local preachers, many from the Primitive Methodist denomination, yet in that movement there was a feeling that it was impossible to bear not only the burden of Roman Catholicism and Anglicanism, but the ordinary Protestant theology. He had often wondered whether it was possible to take that simple faith, that pure Theism to those people. He was a firm believer in the absolute necessity of religion. One man had done more for him than all the rest together, and that was Joseph Mazzini. The writings of that great man had made him practically a Unitarian, and they had done the same for hundreds, who had never expressed it and were still worshipping in orthodox circles. They had unconsciously given up what was formerly regarded as fundamental, and they were now valued members of churches which had no intention of getting rid of them. He could not help feeling that the Unitarian minister who endured and kept to his work over a course of years was the one man of faith in the churches. They had few flourishing churches as compared with orthodoxy, yet he did not think that any other ministers had such far-reaching influence. At all centres of influence they found Unitarians, and notably in the Press, though not known by that name. Proceeding to speak of the religious aspects of social reform, he said that while Unitarians were divided on economic and political questions, yet there were great advantages in their faith. In judging of such matters Unitarians were free from any external authority, whether of Church or Bible, and to all could apply the test of reason. They avoided superstition on one side and mere materialism on the other. He felt with Mazzini that the materialist always bowed to circumstance, but not so the believer in God. To him truth was above all, even above life itself. It was not mere existence that had the highest claim. Then to the Unitarian citizenship was part of his religion. The common distinction between secular and sacred was false; everything good was sacred. So they approached all complicated social questions, pressing for solution, to judge with unencumbered reason and conscience what was right and good. For instance, in the question of cremation, no old theological prepossession could be allowed to stand against the clear demonstration of Sir Henry Thompson that especially in large towns it was imperative for the sake of the living. He was grateful to Unitarians as a historic body, for having helped people to see through the mists of man-created theology, and to see that there was law reigning in the world, that God was in the world, and that in the exercise of intellect they had a great responsibility from God. The one Unitarian in the Nationalist ranks had said to him: "Creed does influence this life, but it does not make destiny in the next." It must influence life, how a man thought about God. Under the influence of the purest Theism in Mazzini Italy had been united, with the watchword "For God and the People"; and never had a great world-wide reform left out God from its watch-word. He wished that was known to the working men of England, that they might see that God was not a mere abstraction but a great living principle, and that men must think more of duties than of rights.

As to the housing of the people Unitarians had a good record. That must become a burning question in politics, and he trusted that the religious people of the country would take hold of it; and so with the question of drink, and of provision for old age. Humanity was at the heart of the great gospel of the Galilean, and those things could not be neglected. He felt honoured by the invitation to be present at that meeting. There he saw what had made England great. He did not know what would have become of England if it had not been for Nonconformity. When their history was known, no man would say that creed had no influence on life.

Mr. RICHARD EVE, in proposing a vote of thanks to Sir John Brunner and Mr. Maddison for their addresses, said that Unitarianism was not a modern mode of thought; their belief was essentially one of liberty. They sought God within, and could tolerate no interference of the priest. They felt that God was ruling in the world, and that His power made for righteousness in the hearts of true men. The religion of Jesus was expressed in the two great commandments, that they must love God with mind and heart and strength, and their neighbour as themselves; and that was what they wanted.

Mr. C. FENTON seconded the motion, and described a visit he had recently paid to the grave of John Locke. It stood outside a little village church in Essex, while of the great country house which had been Locke's home no trace remained. Yet the influence of the man's thought could not be lost out of the life of the English people. So it might be with that chapel, and he trusted that years hence the influence of the religious life nourished there would make itself felt among the people round about.

The motion was very heartily adopted, and Sir JOHN BRUNNER having responded, proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman, which was seconded by Mr. J. COGAN CONWAY, and no less cordially adopted.

THE SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS AT OXFORD.

HAVING been asked to gather up the threads of our Sunday-school Teachers' Session, which has just been held at Oxford, and of which so full a report will be found in THE INQUIRER of these two last weeks, I have much pleasure in attempting to do so.

And first of all let us begin at the beginning, not only in order to make the account more complete, but because it is really a parable story, and illustrates what happens every day in our Sunday-school work—namely, that seeds are sown and plants spring up, but not in a single night.

At the annual meeting of the Sunday-school Association, held in 1887, the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, read a paper in which he gave an account of a College course for Sunday-school teachers, held each summer somewhere—I forget where—in the United States. This was a very serious undertaking, for it lasted two or three months; but the reader urged that some experiment of the kind might be tried with advantage here in England, in order that teachers might learn how to give their lessons with more method and more power.

Now as this desire for lifting our ideal of Sunday-school teaching from the "happy-go-lucky" style into which all of us were so prone to fall, was very strong in me too, the suggestion fitted in exactly with my wishes, and so it was carefully tucked away in one little pigeon-hole of my brain. Many a time since it has been brought out for consideration and put back again; but last year the seed began to germinate. Manchester College, at Oxford, naturally presented itself as the most fitting place for such an experiment to be tried, and on the hearty co-operation of our friends there for anything which would be helpful to our young people, we knew quite well that we might rely. So for The Helper of 1899 Mr. Joseph Wood was asked to write an article, suggesting that a short summer session should be held in Oxford this year; his paper was forwarded to the Principal of Manchester College and to others, and from all sides it met with nothing but approval.

The rest was comparatively easy. The plan having been laid before the Sunday-school Association Committee, it was approved, and a sub-committee appointed to arrange the details; thus it came about that this summer we have had our first session for Sunday-school teachers at Oxford, and the result has surpassed our most sanguine expectations.

Teachers gathered from fifty-eight centres, two even coming from the Sister Isle, and all brought their "whole self" along with their bodily presence. They had come, not only determined to enjoy themselves, but determined to be helped; and so we had every lecture followed with avidity, questions asked in simple direct fashion, all self-consciousness being forgotten in the desire to seek to understand the various knotty points.

The time-table had required some care and thought; and, although to a casual observer it might have appeared somewhat "bitty," those who followed the course could not fail to note the "plan" which underlay the variety. The idea was that the first lecture each morning was to be directed to the personal culture of the teacher, and towards this end a glimpse into the Old Testament was given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and into Paul's life and letters by Dr. James Drummond. Professor Upton spoke of the relation of Ethics to Religion, and the Rev. J. E. Odgers described to us some of the struggles which had led to the development of Liberal Nonconformity in England.

After a half-hour's pause the second lecture was given, this time the subject having some practical bearing on Sunday-school work. The questions of discipline, method, organisation, were taken in turn; teaching from Bible, from hymn and story, and from Natural Science, each was passed in review, the course finishing with an able lecture from Miss Edith Drummond on the method of preparing and presenting a lesson, which method may fitly be applied to every subject chosen for the teacher's lesson.

And it was striking and most interesting, as affording corroborative testimony to the usefulness of the method formulated by Miss Drummond, that in essentials it was so similar to that advocated by our senior teacher, the Rev. J. Freeston, in his delightful lesson on how to use natural objects in our Sunday classes.

Three times we met as Teachers in Council, taking up the questions of organisation of the ideal Sunday-school, what to teach our senior classes, and how to gather our young people into our churches. In the consideration of this last and most important matter the teachers spoke in their dual capacity—namely, in that of members of churches as well as teachers. It was unanimously agreed that on returning to our various centres we should ask the co-operation of minister and congregation to invite our young people to join the church in some more real fashion than obtains to-day. Some wished for a special service of dedication, others preferred no such distinctive mark; but all agreed in wishing that our young people could be made to feel more vividly that their church was the religious home and centre of activity and usefulness for them, as much as for the elders of the congregation.

The desire to help the teachers on all sides of their nature made the recreative excursions one important part of our scheme, while the social side was further provided for by the common mid-day meal, a conversazione held in the beautiful library—where we were received by Dr. and Mrs. Drummond—and by the "at homes" given by several Oxford friends.

The address delivered by the Principal of the College at the opening of the session, and that by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter on the Sunday morning, will not easily be forgotten, while the inspiring account of the great painter of the century, G. F. Watts, by Mr. Lucking Tavener, was a real revelation to most of his hearers.

When we add to all the activities referred to above a lantern evening on Friday, and the giving of three excellent model lessons in the Oxford Mission to the scholars on Sunday afternoon, I think every one will acknowledge that we were no mere idle visitors to the venerable University city.

And now that it is all over what impressions have remained behind? The first is, doubtless, a feeling of grateful thanks to our Oxford friends; to the Principal and Professors of the College and their ladies, to Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Woods, who acted as the local secretaries, and to the energetic and capable steward of the College, Mr. Soundy, and to his good wife.

Then our thoughts pass on to our companions and friends. The words of the poet come to us, "What's done is what remains"; and we ask ourselves, What will remain? Much every way, I verily believe; faith in our work has been strengthened, the belief in its importance increased, and the determination to be more worthy of our high calling will urge upon us all the necessity of bringing better preparation and more serious application to our self-appointed task. A great many difficulties can be overcome when we once believe that a victory over them is possible. "Don't fear to fall and you won't fall," the cat says to Rudy in Hans Christian Andersen's story, and the knowledge that other teachers have been able to conquer difficulties will have at least shown us that these need not be invincible. We have learnt that good discipline is quite compatible with the sweetest spirit, that proper observance of rule will prevent that disorder which eventually must end in severity, and we have learnt something of the method of giving our lesson. And as all these things pass in review through our minds we cannot help wishing that every one of our teachers could have shared the privileges that have been ours during the last fortnight. In order to have a permanent record of our doings and also to enable others to know more of what has been said and done, I propose to make a prominent feature of our summer session in the next annual volume of The Helper, and in its pages I hope that at least full notes of all the lectures will find a place.

MARIAN PRITCHARD.

II.

"THE May meetings are not in it!" "The Triennial Conference is nowhere!" "There has never been anything like this in the Unitarian Body!" These were some of the expressions which your present correspondent heard, as he mingled with the glad groups of Sunday-school teachers, between lectures, in the clean, cool corridors, or out in the sunny "quad," of Manchester College. And when he himself was buttonholed and asked: "Why was this summer school never thought of before?" he could find no better reply at the time than to say: "Perhaps the psychological moment had not arrived until now!" Be that as it may, the immense and complete success of the summer school proves that it has met a real need in our Sunday-schools, and that the programme provided was exactly what our teachers wanted. Nor must we blame those who made the comparisons which I have quoted. They could only compare this summer school with the best things of the kind they knew. And all they meant to say, I suppose, was: "This summer school beats all!" And in sober prose I am bound to admit that it did. It is simply impossible to make any who were not present, truly realise the earnestness, the desire to learn, the eagerness and practicality of inquiry, the workfulness, the spirit of comradeship, the joy of being together, manifested at these meetings. Many teachers had come long distances, all had evidently come with purpose, and the uppermost feeling appeared to be: "This is the opportunity of a life-time. Now or never we can learn something about Sunday-school teaching and work. We must make the most of a splendid opportunity." And this the 140 teachers certainly did. There were no abstentions from lectures, although there was each morning an academic lecture, mainly designed for the personal culture of the teacher, and a practical lecture mainly designed to be helpful to the teacher in actual Sunday-school work, each of these lectures averaging about an hour in length, and about a quarter of an hour being given to questions and answers on the lectures. On the other hand, after the substantial and merry mid-day meal together in the College, these same hard-working teachers of the morning (or students I should say), in true undergraduate fashion, plunged as heartily into pleasure in the afternoon—visiting the Colleges, the University Park, the glorious walks round Oxford; going in boating parties up the river, in waggonettes or upon cycles on the roads to such places as Woodstock, Blenheim, Wytham, Nuneham, &c.; or to afternoon tea or garden party at Dr. Drummond's, Professor Carpenter's, Professor Odgers' and at the famous old-world house, with its "careless ordered" garden and orchard, out at Littlemore, once the residence of John Henry Newman, in the most momentous period of his life, now the home of the ever-genial Professor Upton. Here was room indeed to have tea and talk al fresco and galore! And these are only dim hints of the heaped-up intensity of enjoyments afforded us in play-time. Then, for a few of the evenings, conferences on some branch of Sunday-school work had been put in the programme. These also were not only loyally but enthusiastically attended, and, as if even these were not sufficient, such was the spirit of these teachers that they must needs agitate for and secure an additional evening for another conference upon a subject not programmed, but about which there was much warmth of heart. Of this extra conference I will tell in a few minutes. Just now (would that I had a lantern or some such magic wherewith to do it!) I want to give my readers a specimen day in this summer school.

Picture, then, Manchester College Chapel on, say, Wednesday morning at 9.45. Dr. Drummond is at the reading desk; Sunday-school teachers from all parts of the country are in the pews. A ten minutes' service, preparatory to the work and pleasure of the day, is just beginning. It consists of Scripture lesson, hymn, and prayer. And how appropriate each of these services has been, whether conducted by the Principal, or Mr. Carpenter, or Mr. Odgers. Not only the hymn and the prayer, but the very Scripture seemed a veritable "lesson for the day." This helpful little service over you have time for another glance at the gloriously-coloured Burne-Jones windows in the chapel (whatever you think of the figures in them), listen it may be, to the rich-toned organ, or quietly look over the printed syllabus of the forthcoming lecture. "Old Tom" of Christ Church sounds ten o'clock, and now Dr. Drummond begins his lecture from the pulpit on "St. Paul the Man." One hundred and forty students sit before him, note-book in hand, syllabus ready to refer to. As I watched all this, on the first day I was there, I saw that these 140 all meant business. They were there to work, to learn. There was intense and continued listening. Some of them, it was evident, were not accustomed to both listening and note-taking, but even these did what they could, and certainly listened with determination. For just one hour Dr. Drummond talked in the easiest, clearest way about Paul, as if he not only knew him (as he does!) but in such a way as to make you know him too. "Old Tom" strikes eleven, and the lecture closes beautifully, as if "Old Tom" and the lecturer had arranged it between them not to take a minute more than the allotted time.

Then comes a recess until 11.30, giving time for a run into the fresh air, a chat in the wide cool corridors, or a saunter on the grass in the "quad." At 11.30, obeying the signal, all are seated in the chapel again, and now comes a lecture on "Object and Method in Sunday-school Teaching." This closes exactly at 12.30, and fifteen minutes are allowed for questions—questions, not remarks—and answers. A quarter of an hour later—that is, at one o'clock—the happy clatter begins of knives and forks upon well-spread tables, around which are gathered 140 of us, like a jolly family over mid-day meal. Then came the afternoon pleasures, the evening conferences and enjoyments, already sufficiently indicated.

And thus it went swiftly on each day, for nine days, of course with changes of lecturers and subjects, as also with changes of pleasures. For nine days, then, some of our teachers have been to College in Oxford. That is what it really means. And they will never forget, nor, I hope, for many a year, will our Sunday-schools cease to feel the influence of the knowledge gained, the spirit generated, at this summer school.

Our Elder Scholars and the Congregation.

There was one topic, not in the programme, upon which intense earnestness showed itself. This was the relationship of our elder scholars to our congregation, and vice versa. In other words, what can be done to induce our congregations to see and do their duty towards the elder scholars in our schools—the natural duty of inducing these elder scholars to become members of our congregations? This question was evidently a burning one in the hearts of all present, and hence there was a full and eager meeting on Wednesday evening in the College lecture-room. On behalf of the Sunday-school Association, your present correspondent had to preside, as Professor Carpenter was otherwise engaged. He was asked to tell what methods were used in Atherton (Chowbent) to attach the elder scholars to the congregation. He also told what methods have been recently adopted at Bank-street, Bolton, and subsequently called on the Rev. H. M. Livens to relate what has been done for so many years at Unity, Bolton. In the very practical and thoroughly earnest discussion which ensued the following took part:—Rev. Joseph Freeston, Mr. Frank Johnson (Liscard), Miss Newman (Bristol), Miss Brown

(Leeds), Miss Litchfield (Birmingham), Mr. Lucking Tavenor (Stepney), Mr. C. Stainer (Leeds), Miss M. Pritchard (London), Mr. J. H. Woodhead (Manchester), Mr. H. Dilicate (Stalybridge), and the Rev. E. A. Voysey, B.A. (Reading). The speeches were, as a rule, brief, lively, and to the point. Space only forbids a summary of them. There was really no difference of opinion except as to the method of doing, what all were most anxious to do—namely, to join our elder scholars to our congregations. All present were united, and intensely united, in the desire to see this all-important thing systematically and universally attempted and accomplished. It appeared to be keenly felt that our congregations are neglecting one of their primary duties if they do not of set purpose receive and welcome the elder scholars of our Sunday-schools, and also (which must not be forgotten) the elder children of our more cultured families—children who may not go to Sunday-school—into the fellowship and duties and opportunities of congregational life. Mr. C. Stainer, in an earnest speech, moved the following resolution, which was seconded by the Rev. E. A. Voysey, B.A. :—

That in the opinion of Sunday-school teachers and others now assembled in session at Manchester College, it is desirable that our elder scholars should be encouraged to recognise the solemn obligations of the Christian life by services of dedication at which they shall be welcomed into the religious fellowship of the Church.

Miss Newman asked for the following words to be added to the resolution, to which the mover and seconder assented :—

That our churches recognise the responsibility transferred to them, and use every means in their power to make the chapel a religious home and field of useful labour for our young people.

Much discussion ensued. Miss Pritchard had moved and Mr. J. H. Woodhead seconded, an amendment, in connection with which Miss Pritchard made one of the finest appeals which even she perhaps ever made. It was an inspiration, and had its effect. After some consideration Mr. Stainer and Mr. Voysey withdrew their resolution in favour of Miss Pritchard's amendment, and an entirely unanimous vote was, with great heartiness, given for the amendment, now the resolution, which ran as follows :—

That we, the members here assembled, feel the immense importance of the young people of our congregations and schools being invited to become members of our churches in some definite way. That when we return to our various centres we will ask our minister and members of our congregation to take steps without delay to make arrangements for the introduction of our young people into our Church; that our Church should recognise its responsibility for these young people, and that its members should use every means in their power to make the chapel a religious home and a field of useful labour for our young people.

The Ideal Sunday-school.

This also was the subject of a Conference on Thursday morning. It took the place of a set lecture from 11.30 to 12.30, and was a happy variety. Miss Pritchard presided, and pointed out that it was not the ideal of, but the ideal Sunday-school, which she desired us to try that morning to build up, out of what already is and of what might be done in our schools. Mr. Woodhead, in a charming and suggestive manner, led the way on these lines; then brief contributions were rapidly given by those present who had anything to add upon the following points which were taken seriatim :—(1) Admission of scholars into our schools. What is and what ought to be required of children before enrolment in our ranks? (2) Systems of roll-calling and registering of attendances. From any point of view, is a general roll-call, which takes up so much time, &c., a good system? If not, what is best for small schools, and what for large? (3) Dismissal into classes (after opening) and arrangement of classes. Suppose only a large room, what to do? Suppose a large room and only one classroom, which should have it—eldest class or infants? The infants had it! (4) Closing service: that in The Helper for 1899 much recommended (p. 242).

Such is a skeleton—and by no means a complete one—around which was built up in that hour, out of experiences and aspirations, out of facts and possibilities, the ideal Sunday-school.

General Impressions concerning the Summer School.

Ample space, Mr. Editor, you supposed you had given me when you asked me to act as correspondent, yet I find myself with much to tell. Greatly should I rejoice to describe the delightful and helpful lecture on "How to use Nature in teaching Religion." Often have I heard Mr. Freeston during a quarter of a century, but never better than on Friday morning last. He was truly at his best. He seemed inspired for the occasion.

The Sunday School Association is to be warmly congratulated upon its enterprise and entire success in providing this summer school for Sunday-school teachers. We know in whose brain it originated, and whose heart and mind, aided by her equally devoted brother, have carried it through, not merely without a hitch, but with perfect balance of purpose from beginning to end. This could only be done by seeing the end from the beginning, and marshalling every detail in its proper order and place. Even then success would not have been possible had not the Manchester College Professors entered heartily into the whole scheme and aim. They have certainly "given themselves" cordially and unstintingly to the endeavour. To them the Sunday School Association, and all who have attended the meetings, are beyond words indebted. And, I believe it is safe to say on the other hand, that the Professors themselves feel indebted for the opportunity thus given to them. Never did I admire the Professors of Manchester College more than during these lectures. Like everybody else each man of them seemed to feel the inspiration of the hour, and hence the academic lectures were a wonderful success. Not every day can a Manchester College Professor have 140 eager students to lecture to. And my notion is that the College was never put to a better purpose than it was last week.

The closing scenes on Saturday over the mid-day meal were subdued only by the thought of parting. It fell to your correspondent to accord to the College authorities, on behalf of the S.S.A. and all teachers present, a warm tribute of gratitude in a few words; to which Dr. Drummond fittingly responded. Then came "Auld Lang Syne," followed by hand-shakings and good-byes! A large photograph of all present had been taken during the week in the "quad." and on this, which was a great success, we shall be long grouped together. But links and ties unseen, which may outlast even this, were made or strengthened in many minds and hearts at this summer school. Some of us, too, it seems, got "snapshotted" from time and time, and for the first time realised our value when copies of these snapshots were announced at sixpence, and even at threepence a person! One amongst us, however, had been "snapshotted" in such a pose and environment that he put the price up to five shillings a copy, including postage.

A very eager query was in the air during the latter days as to the summer school. It was this: "Will it be held every year?" And the wisest answer appeared to be: "Probably not. But it might be held, at any rate, next year again, to enable another set of teachers to come while the influence of this is still upon them. And then the school might afterwards be held biennially."

And—would you believe it?—there were teachers actually asking, before they left, to have their names put down for next time!

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Rose's Diary," by H. S. Sutton.

Put not on me, O Lord! this work divine,
For I am too unworthy, and Thy speech
Would be defrauded through such lips as mine.

I have not learnt Thee yet, and shall I teach?

O choose some other instrument of Thine!

The great, the royal ones, the noble saints,
These all are Thine, and they will speak for Thee.

No one who undertakes Thy words but faints;

Yet, if that man is saintly and sin-free,
Through him Thou wilt, O Lord, self-uttered be.

But how shall I say anything, a child
Not fit for such high work,—oh, how shall I

Say what in speaking must not be defiled?
And yet—and yet—if I refuse to try,
The light that burns for my own life will die.

My mind was ruffled with small cares to-day,

And I said hasty words, and did not keep Long-suffering patience well; and now how deep

My sorrow for this sin! In vain I weep
For foolish words I never can unsay.

Yet not in vain, oh surely not in vain!
This trouble must compel me to take heed,
And surely I shall learn how much I need
Thy constant strength mine own to help indeed,

And all my thought to patience to constrain.

Yes, I shall learn at length, though I neglect

Day after day to use my help from Thee.
O aid me, that I always recollect
Thy gentle-heartedness; and O correct
Whatever else of sin Thou seest in me!

OBITUARY.

LADY MANFIELD.

THREE months have not yet passed since we had to record the death of Miss Milne, of Northampton, at Redlands, Cliftonville, the residence of her brother-in-law, Sir Philip Manfield, whose household had been her home for over forty years; and now her sister, Lady Manfield, has been also called away. Sisters they were indeed, in all that makes life gracious and helpful; and what we said before of the loss to the congregation of the Kettering-road Church, and to a much wider circle in the town, must now be repeated with sorrowful truth. With a spirit eager in the love of knowledge and all beautiful things, rich in the grace which makes a true home, and goes out in constant kindly ministrations, Lady Manfield had been latterly crippled by failing powers, and sorrow at her departure must be chastened by the thought of what the great change means to her. The deepest sympathy will be felt for Sir Philip Manfield, who himself is still seriously ill.

DR. SADLER'S "ADDRESSES AND HYMNS."

SIR,—I have recently brought out a small volume of "Addresses and Hymns" by the late Dr. Sadler. The volume has been printed for private circulation, and distributed among a large number of those who it was thought would value it. There may be others who would like to have it, and there is a small stock of copies at Essex Hall, which may be had on application to Mr. Philip Green. A Postal Order for 1s. should accompany the application in order to cover expenses.

"Lead me in a plain path."—Psalm xviii. 11.

NOWADAYS we are used to roads—wide, smooth, well-kept roads—with walls or hedges on both sides, and guide-posts, with the names of the towns or villages to which they lead, where the roads cross or branch, so that no one can mistake the way. We can hardly realise a time when these hard clean roads did not lead all through the country.

But once, you know, there were no roads, there were only paths leading from place to place—paths worn by the feet of men or animals, going to and fro, through forests, over moors, round bogs, between the meadows, up and down the hillsides. Sometimes the path was well-trodden and could not be missed, but sometimes it went over desolate places where there were few travellers. The snows of winter, or the heavy rains of spring, or the sands blown about by the winds, covered it or washed it away. Sometimes paths ran together, or branched in different ways, and the traveller could not tell which to take. Sometimes he was puzzled by the worn places which looked like paths, but after a little came to nothing.

There are parts of the world now where there are no roads, only paths, where the traveller is only too glad to find a path, even a rough and narrow one, just a mark, a track, to show him that some one has passed that way before.

Here, our paths are mostly for pleasure. We keep the old-time paths through the fields, and won't let them be closed, because they are such a delightful change from the hard and dusty roadside. I was walking along such a path the other day. One stepped off the road through a turnstile, and in a moment one was in a meadow full of blue salvia, yellow vetches, white daisies, red sorrel, and clover. The tall grass brushed against you as you walked. Great clumps of dog-roses were in blossom beside you. The river ran softly below the willowy bank, the larks were singing, the world seemed so wide and spacious, and you were free of the whole of it.

Still, I was glad of the path. I didn't know exactly where I was, but a path always goes somewhere. Other people have gone over it. There is always some reason for it, always something at the other end, and if you follow it you arrive there.

And there is another thing about a path. You know you have a right to be there. If you leave the path and go wandering about, as sometimes one has a fancy, you have an uneasy feeling that you are trespassing, that you are where you have no business to be. But on the path you feel secure. You know you are within your right.

But if you were not walking just for pleasure, but were bound for some particular place, and especially if it were an unknown way, you would be gladder still of the path. And what you would care for most of all would be, not that it should be pretty, or that it should be easy, but that it should be plain, a path there could be no mistake about.

Perhaps you might be belated, and then to make a mistake and go wandering off on something that looked like a path, but was not, or on a path that led the wrong way, would mean exposure, anxiety at least, perhaps danger and death. Two paths might seem so alike that you could not tell which to take. They might come together farther on, or they might lead ever so far apart; and there is no one to ask, no guide-post. Which should you take? Which is the real path and which is the little side or cross path which you have nothing to do with? Oh, if the path, the right path, were only plain, so that one could tell certainly which it was, what a relief it would be!

It is not exactly this kind of path that this verse, "Lead me in a plain path," means. But this experience of the difficulty of finding the right path, and the trouble he had got into when he had made a mistake and chosen the wrong path, was in the mind of the man who wrote it. He knew just what it was to miss the path he wanted to take, and this would make his prayer very vivid and real to him. He would think of the times he had been confused and had chosen wrongly, and had got into trouble as he went hither and thither, and he would say: "It is just so in my life. I come to places where I don't know which is the right course to take. I don't know how to decide. I am not sure which is the best way. I am not clear which is the right. I wish I were certain. I wish I couldn't mistake. 'Lead me in a plain path.'"

We often speak of life as a path. It seems more natural to call it a path than a road, perhaps because we each go so much alone in it, and each has to make his own experience in it. And, as in a path, we each go in the track others have made for us. These tracks sometimes mix and cross each other, and we are apt to lose the true one. Very often we take the easy path, or what looks so, and find it leads us quite elsewhere than we intended.

Still, if we are always really looking for the path, if we are always noticing its signs, it is wonderful how quick we may become at recognising it. We may train our eye so that the path may be quite clear to us, we seem to know it by instinct, when to another who has not thus trained his eye, it is not seen at all.

There are two or three signs God has given to make our path plain which never lead us wrong. All we need do is to look for them.

First, our path is always to be the path of truthfulness. Which is the path that tempts us to hide something? to give just a little twist to the truth? to deny something—perhaps to invent something false? That is the path we must not take. That is the path that gets more confused, more difficult, more dangerous, the farther we go on it. No matter how easy it looks, or how we persuade ourselves it doesn't matter, or that we can make it all right, or that we need only go on it a little way, it always leads us wrong.

Second, our path is always to be the path of honesty. Honesty is to act what truthfulness is to our words. It prevents our doing what is false. It prevents our claiming or taking any unfair advantage of anybody. It is not pretending, not cheating. Let us ask ourselves, when we are not quite sure where we are going, should I be ashamed to have other people—the best people—know of my doing this? That will settle a great many doubts. That will throw light on our path. Because we all know that if we should be ashamed if others found us on it, that can't be the right path for us.

Thirdly, our path is always to be the path of kindness. If what you are hesitating over doing is going to make you unkind to anybody, neglectful, careless, ill-natured, selfish, if it merely leaves others out, if not injuring them it simply forgets them, then we may be sure that is the wrong path too.

And I think these three signs, if we are looking for them, will in general be plain to us, and will make our path plain. Let us ask of anything we think of doing: Is this truthful? Is this honest? Is it kind? and we shall not go far wrong. For this is the way in which God "leads us," and makes our path plain before us.

OLD COUNTRY CHAPELS.

Old chapels in small country places are what we have in mind, led to the thought of them by the recent meeting at Newbury, of which a report will be found in our present issue.

There, at Newbury, is a fine old chapel, dating from the seventeenth century, but still standing four-square in sunshine or in storm; not even in a back street, but down a cobbled yard, or to be reached by a path along the river bank. The square, red-tiled roof is seen among the trees, and from a distance there might seem to be an old country house standing in its pleasant garden. But close at hand the graves are seen, and the several plain doors evidently lead into a venerable meeting-house. On entering there is even less room for doubt, for there stand the old reading-desk and pulpit, and while the central block of the former high-back pews have been replaced by modern seats, under the gallery are still preserved three spacious family pews, and in one of these a quaint and rare survival of the past. In one corner at the front of the pew is a little baby-pew, with the floor raised to a fitting level, and a little seat in it, and just room for one staid little damsel of, perhaps, three years old to sit in it and take a serious part in the service. If it were attempted to pack two modern babies into that little pew within a pew we do not know what the result might be!

Apart from the gallery, which faces the pulpit, solid wooden pillars help to support the lofty roof, and there is ample room for a large congregation; signs are not wanting that there was a time when all the available space was fully occupied. Clearly the old "Presbyterian Chapel" was once the home of a prosperous and influential congregation; no doubt the chief, if not the only, Nonconformist place of worship in the town, second only to the fine old parish church. We can even imagine that there was once a time early in last century when the Presbyterian Meeting-house was not second, but first, in public esteem, and all that was best in Newbury gathered there for worship, while the parish church itself was neglected and comparatively empty.

But times are changed; new movements of religious life have brought fresh vigour to the parish church, while Nonconformists have been subdivided into further groups, and in the old Meeting-house there is now only a remnant found to maintain the traditions of reverence and worship which are gathered about the place. This is but one instance of what has happened in many country places, and the fact ought to be frankly faced, in order that we may not only be clear as to the significance of our past history but may see what is our present duty towards such old foundations and the remaining congregations.

At the meeting at Newbury last week, when an appeal was made for funds to renovate the old chapel, both the Chairman, Mr. COLFOX, and Sir JOHN BRUNNER were urgent that in any restoration that was undertaken the character of the building should, as far as possible, be maintained, with its venerable aspect and its eloquence of an honourable past. Such a memorial of the fidelity of former generations is certainly worth preserving, and it was rightly said that the trust remains not only with the actual congregation, but with the whole community of which it forms a part. And if the outward building is thus to be cherished, still more is that the case with the history of the congregation, and the principles of religious life for which it stands.

The congregation was born out of the early conflicts of Nonconformity, and in the course of last century took its place among such as chose the undogmatic principle as basis of their religious fellowship. Untouched by the enthusiasms of the Methodist revival and the re-birth of Evangelical fervour in the Church, those congregations held on the even tenour of their way, nourishing an unpretending piety, an earnest benevolence and in many of their members a strenuous public spirit. Unshackled in the exercise of thought, bent only on knowing the truth both of present duty and of the actual teaching of Jesus, they became Unitarian, and suffered whatever obloquy or loss followed the profession of that faith.

It is a simple fact that in the course of that historical development numbers declined, and the orthodox are naturally ready to point the finger of scorn and to declare that it proves the falseness of the principles and of the doctrines taught. But the matter is not to be so lightly judged. We will not say that there was no failure in the past, any more than we should dare to say it of the present, in faithfulness to opportunities of service and the duties of the hour. But we do not know that greater faithfulness would have commanded numbers or popularity, nor that diminished numbers may not, on the other hand, be taken as the honourable price of uncompromising faithfulness to truth. We must be content to accept the facts, and to know that if there was not in some past generations an eager and over-mastering enthusiasm, there was a steadfast integrity of purpose, a willingness to suffer for the sake of principle, a noble, single-hearted devotion to private charities and to the public good. We would not exchange for the most abundant prosperity and popular favour the principle of spiritual freedom, the openness to truth, the straightforward earnestness, which cannot separate religion from life, which are the sacred inheritance we have received from the fathers who were before us.

In this spirit we should think of those old chapels in country towns, where for one reason or another there has been failure of numbers or resources. The reason is not always the same; in some cases it may have been through neglect of duty on the part of minister or people, often it is because of an entire shifting of industries and the consequent removal of the sturdiest people from the town. But whatever the cause, that is no reason for the final abandonment of a post of duty. Even if there are only two or three gathered for earnest worship in an old meeting-house where once hundreds assembled, yet there need be no shame in the hearts of the loyal remnant, nor any faithless discouragement. There is still a fearless witness to be borne, the word of truth to be spoken, the humble life of Christian discipleship and brotherly helpfulness to be lived: and any such gathering of true-hearted worshippers, entering gratefully into the inheritance of the past, may be of good courage, and by God's grace may redeem the coming time and secure a wider field of service.

We have referred to Newbury as a particular instance; but wherever such old chapels are found, with congregations that have now a hard struggle to maintain their position, they should not be left in neglect or isolation, but the greater wealth and stronger life of other churches should stand by them and sustain them with the encouragement of a larger fellowship. We do not say that no old chapel should ever be closed, but the utmost should be done with unabated faith and abundant generosity, in memory of an honourable past and with hope of a better future to maintain every such home of freedom and earnest piety. From those little country places some of the best workers have gone forth, both ministers and laymen, who have become the strength of other larger churches. But neither duty nor affection is to be measured by the prospect of outward success or reward. "Bear ye one another's burdens" is a rule for churches, as for brethren, of one household of faith; and both for suffering and rejoicing we must know that we are one people. So shall we fulfil the law of CHRIST, and do the work to which we are called of God.

THE PULPIT.

CHRISTIANITY IN MODERN LIFE.*

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

"Be ye therefore perfect."—Matt. v. 48.

"Till we all come . . . unto a perfect man."—Ephes. iv. 13.

THE nineteenth century will be notable in our history for many reasons. It has witnessed industrial expansions without parallel in the records of the past. It has seen inventions multiply which conquer space and time, and create a fellowship all round the globe, so that two hemispheres can think with one thought. It has watched the birth of great scientific generalisations which have profoundly modified its conception of life, have brought man into more intelligible harmony with nature, and knit all things into one mighty whole. It has seen political changes alike abroad and at home to which preceding centuries could offer no counterpart; nations have swiftly grown conscious of their unity, and risen into majestic might; while power has passed from privileged classes, and Governments have learned that they exist not for themselves but for the people.

Yet these are not the only or the most eminent claims which our time will establish on the thoughtful attention of posterity. This is an age of discoveries: and it will be known hereafter, I am deeply persuaded, as the age which discovered Christianity. We stand at the beginning of a movement, nay—in spite of some obviously conflicting appearances—we are already far advanced in it, compared to which the Reformation of the sixteenth century will hereafter seem but a small change. It is a movement which is slowly clearing away those growths of later times, which have so long obscured the true nature of our religion. History, philosophy, criticism, have all had their part in bringing it about. It is not the expression of the genius of any single man; it is the uprising of the whole power—mind, heart, and soul—of a free and educated humanity. In the vast mental quickening of our day it was inevitable that Christianity should be submitted to the same tests which every other institution had to undergo. Its ecclesiastical development could be studied, its line of growth traced back to its earliest stock, its influence on social evolution distinguished in part at least from the other forces shaping and guiding the order of our time; and when this was done, inquiry passed fearlessly back to its very origins, and claimed the same right of investigation at its sources which it had already applied at every tributary along its mighty stream. The task of disengaging it from its first forms has indeed been only in part accomplished, and it may be that there are problems connected with it which can never be satisfactorily—still less completely—solved: but who that looks abroad upon the Churches can fail to see that they are all concentrating their attention on certain great common ideas, and that the master-thought of Jesus—the kingdom of God—is leavening now the beliefs and hopes of men as for eighteen centuries it has never done before? No longer is it placed in some far-off heaven. No longer does the Church, and the Church only, hold the key.

We are learning to interpret it now as Jesus Himself interpreted it, as an immense spiritual quickening of the society in which we live. We are coming to understand that it is the hope not of eternity, but of our own day. We are at last made aware that it is as good for London and Lancashire as for Jerusalem and Galilee, and that it will make England, if we will but have it so, a Holy Land. This it is which distinguishes Christianity and the Hebrew root from which it sprang, alone among the religions of the world. Here and here only do we find religion conceived as a principle of social growth: here and here only do we find religion set forth as the essential motive of human progress. "Give up the world," cried the sages of India or the mediæval monk, "it is a snare and a delusion. God calls you away from it to be at peace with Him." "Transform the world," cries Christianity, "to be the scene of a divine life; God sends you into it to be fellow-workers with Him." And so it sets before us a quest to call forth our energies, and a vision of fulfilment to satisfy our longing, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness," "till ye all come unto a perfect man." Nay more, it has discerned in Jesus what he would not offer us in himself, the type, the realised ideal, of the man who sought and found, the man who pressed forward and attained.

For it is this which more especially marks off the teaching of Jesus from that elder prophecy which makes the Old Testament the world's great book of hope. That, too, had its doctrine of social reform. That, too, delighted to draw its ideal pictures. That, too, turned from the sickening falsehood or oppression of the present to the coming reign of truth and love. But it could conceive this only under a complete change of the outward conditions, and this change lay beyond the reach of the people whom it was to effect. The ideal society must be under an ideal king, fitted for his functions by special equipment with the spirit of the Sovereign of the world. Or it must be established in an ideal city, where the Architect of the skies Himself laid the foundation and reared the jewelled walls. Some instrument of God must do the work man could not do. The transformation of earth could only be effected by the interference of heaven. And so again and again in the catastrophes of their national history, the prophets thought they had discerned the crisis of judgment and the hour of redemption, but the future which they expected proved a blank, the interposition which they awaited never came, and only the passionate trust survived that the right would still win, for God was God.

It was reserved for Jesus to pluck out the heart of the mystery. He penetrated the great secret, and we have learned from him that the transformation of the world can only be effected by transforming the men and women who compose it. And this is not a sudden but a slow process, for in the thought of Jesus Society is a growth, not a machine, and its progress must be made by life from within, and not merely by readjustments from without. He bids each man remember that he belongs to the whole; he cannot live to himself alone; he is part of the great Order, and the issue of his deeds reach far and wide to hurt or help. And so the new Christianity is grasping this as one of its central truths; it will make Society a whole by teaching each individual to live as himself a whole; it will bring the community to its full growth by bringing every member of it to his own full growth; it will perfect the world by first perfecting men. So it says to the body "Be strong, husband your powers with care, they are a trust from God, health is their normal law." It goes forth among the dim common populations, and cries, "Organise your cities with fair dwellings and clean streets; lay out gardens and parks; bring freshness and beauty into the midst of crowded houses. In the harmony of nature is nothing undivine; in the joy of sense, the glory of eye and ear, lie the witnesses of a Father's sympathy with His children's joy." So it turns to the mind, and bids it freely enter every avenue of knowledge. Do you long for an interest in the dull and weary round of toil? Find it in the stirring deeds of the great of old, or the heroic enterprises of our day. Enter the chambers of imagery, and feed yourself on what is noble and inspiring in art. Go forth when the earth quickens, and hear the message of tree and flower, or learn to read the unspoken language of the stars at night. Let the wisdom of ages enlighten your understanding, quicken your insight, fill you with high ideals, and you will rise above a life that seems sordid and mean, and days that are crowded only with petty cares, into the fellowship of the whole world's thought. Or yet again, the new Christianity looks on the affections and finds them something to be hallowed indeed to God, not by ruthlessly suppressing them, but by cherishing and consecrating them as the free utterance of His heart to ours. In wedded union is no corruption, but an uplifting might, and that man is indeed maimed and incomplete who, in mistaken devotion to heaven, has sought to eradicate what he calls earthly love. And so, in like manner, our faith summons forth the conscience in the light of the humanity of Christ with full confidence that it is no wreck of a fallen and ruined nature, but the Divine Word entering afresh into every soul, and winning clearer and more articulate speech. Here is the sign of the Immanuel, not for ever spoiled and defaced, but ready to rise into new righteousness through hope and love. The perfect man, then, is the watchword by which the new Christianity—which is the oldest of all—that of Christ himself—foretells the perfected Society. And it is not afraid to carry this summons into the darkest places of sin and shame. It sends forth its teachers into the poorest abodes, where the very games of the children seem to have lost their innocence, and home no longer stands for purity and self-sacrificing love, and boldly utters this supreme demand. It will be satisfied with nothing less. It enters the wretched apartment, it addresses the dissolute father, it turns to the drunken and slovenly mother, and makes this tremendous appeal: "Be ye perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect"; be perfect for your own sake, for the world's sake, for God's sake. Christianity alone can fearlessly face the most tremendous obstacles, triumph over the most unfavourable conditions, and still declare each to be a child of God, with full assurance that somewhere if not here, somewhere if not now, he shall yet be full grown, whole, complete. Christianity, and Christianity alone, dares to do this; dares to say to the profligate, the degraded and the base, "You ought, you can"; dares to ask them for the response "I will."

And if this be so, is it not clear what must be the object of religious education? It has many aspects, yet in their broader features they are not hard to seize. For education has to do with the whole man. In the first place, we are here. We have to learn the meaning of the world around us, to interpret the succession of its events, to find our place in its manifold relations. In other words, we need first a knowledge of the facts of life. Again, when we have seriously apprehended the full significance of being here, we seek to know whither we are going, what aims are set before us, what demands are made of us: if life is a quest, what is its goal? That is, we can only rightly apply our knowledge of the facts of life, when we have discerned the true ideals of life. Nor, indeed, does the opening of fair visions exhaust the functions of education. What boots it to contemplate the noblest forms, if we have not the energy and skill to direct the power that will give them concrete shape? The seedling grows not into the stately tree by simply staring at some tall neighbour in the forest: it needs the genial discipline of sun and rain to call forth the response of its inner being. And so the third element of education must ever be the quickening of strength to realise the aims of life.

An education thus broadly conceived will refuse to break up human nature into separate parts and powers; or insist on training one at the expense of all the rest. It will not attempt to invigorate the intellect by starving the affections, or make the conscience robust by cramping and narrowing the mind. It will keep steadily before it the need of cultivating the whole being, and, subject only to the inevitable limitations of time and faculty, will refuse no aid in wakening intelligence, exciting admiration, and ennobling will. Did you ever hear the French epitaph, "He was born a man, and died a grocer?" It is against that restriction of the scope of life that Christianity enters its perpetual protest. Christianity will have us always remember that we are human; from the highest to the lowest, from the statesman who rules an empire, the poet, the artist, the student, to the humblest labourer at his craft, it has for its first word, "Be men." It tells us that the first and greatest of the facts of life is that man is the child of God. No matter how slow of understanding or how dull of heart, no matter how forlorn, polluted, or debased, he bears about him the marks of heaven's own parentage; he is already, though he know it not, a son of the Infinite and the Eternal; the world cannot be lonely for him, he has an Everlasting Father, who calls him to Himself. This is the first great fact of life which Christianity teaches. What, secondly, is the true ideal which it sets before us? It is nothing less, be it said, with lowliness but also with awful joy in so high a privilege—it is nothing less than to reproduce within ourselves the likeness of the divine perfection. There is an aim of which we can never tire: there is a purpose which we can never exhaust: there is a hope which it may well take eternity to fulfil. And to inspire and evoke the energy for realising this high quest, it sets before us the image of Jesus, at the head of the mighty host of saints of every age, bids us enrol ourselves in the great army, and take sides with him in the unintermitting fight with sin and wrong. Personally, Christianity means that the soul and God have found each other out, and can no more be severed even by guilt. We may fall again and again, but we cannot fall irredeemably; for the divine love will seek us out and lift us up. But socially, Christianity will mean the conflict with wrong, the battle with ignorance, the never-ceasing war with evil passion, the perpetual combat with selfishness and shame. Into this warfare the Churches are bound to throw themselves. They cannot remain indifferent to it. A Church which does not strive to be a centre of life and light to those around it, and outside, as well as those within, has not realised one of the very first purposes of its existence. An idle Church is sure, sooner or later, to draw upon itself the dreadful doom, "Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?"

And naturally enough, one of the first duties with which the Church charges itself, is the education of the young. The simple elements of intellectual acquisition it may well leave to other hands; and in the day-school we may see with gladness the foundations laid under skilled hands for higher moral and spiritual culture. But the education of the conscience, the affections and the will, for which the day-school so often makes too slight provision, the Church cannot be content to leave to accident; it must seek to enforce and supplement the truest lessons of the home. And the idea which the Church seeks to carry out through the Sunday-school is the development of our whole nature. That which makes our nature a true whole—let me repeat it—is religion. It is in the light of our sonship to God that all our energies and powers win their highest worth and find their rightful place. In that light we will not look down on anything with scorn, or call it common and unclean. There is place for innocent mirth and harmless gaiety, for the cricket club as for the singing class, to refresh the dull routine of dreary days. There is place for the profound intellectual interest, and, it may be, a little of the severe discipline, of scientific study. There is place for the kindling imagination which delights in beautiful things, and finds a way to the infinite love through the glories of art. There is place for the fervent conscience that is fired by great examples, and longs to lend a hand in making the wilderness a garden, and teaching the desert to blossom with the rose. No narrow views need stifle our endeavours by insisting on one rigid system of uniformity for all. It is the glory of Christianity truly understood that it has room for every worthy capacity of our being, and shuts the door on none. Under the influence of this thought the Churches are slowly remodelling their theologies, revising their methods of action, and welcoming new developments of philanthropy. In this direction our Sunday-schools must lead the way. With this aim you have many of you come hither for study, for conference, and encouragement. Go forth anew assured of each other's sympathy, and take your places once again with untired hearts in the great host pledged to the warfare with ignorance, with suffering, and sin. May the love of God be with you to strengthen you in weakness and renew your might! Behold, the spiritual city is rising in our midst: it is wrought out of each true and loving thought, each faithful word, each strenuous and self-sacrificing deed. Take your share in its rearing. Enter it yourselves, gather within it the young, the forlorn, the tried. Its officers are peace and righteousness, its walls are called salvation, and its gates are praise!

THE DUTY OF WORKING FOR INTERNATIONAL UNITY AND CONCORD.

A LETTER TO UNITARIANS.

FRIENDS,—May I say how much impressed I have ever been by the extent to which the ethical sentiment dominates alike your ideals and your practice? That characteristic has proceeded, I venture to think, from your theological standpoint. You have, more fully perhaps than other followers of Christ, recognised the divine possibilities which exist in man, and the fact that he is called upon to achieve perfection, to pursue the Divine Ideal, in the hope of realising it in ever-increasing degree—"to be perfect as He is perfect."

From such a standpoint, the idea of a divine fraternity and kinship, based on a real sonship, becomes all the more vivid, and should be all the more fruitful in its results.

Surely one of those results should be to make Unitarians especially eager to resist and overcome all opinions, usages, laws and systems, which impede the amity, fraternity and mutual service of men as men—independently of all superficial and transitory differences of race or nationality.

All that separate tribes, nations, communities and classes from each other, sows suspicion, distrust, jealousy and hatred among them, and must in a pre-eminent degree, thwart the purpose of God, and impede the growth of that Kingdom of Heaven on earth which Christ came to announce and create.

Further, you will agree with me that the establishment of that Kingdom is synonymous with the Reign of Righteousness on the earth, under which there shall be absolute justice in the relations of men with each other, in their daily lives, in the smallest things as in the greatest.

Now nothing has so completely and persistently set at naught the will of God and the teaching of Christ in this respect as the practice of War. It has been and is the most flagrant and the most potential obstacle to the realisation of love to God, and of love to man; that love being manifested by self-sacrifice, mercy, justice, forgiveness of injuries, and brotherly fellowship.

War, alike in the motives which produce it, and in all its modes of operation, is the sum of all iniquities, and is the realisation of Hell upon earth, the most complete contradiction of everything for which God created man, and which Jesus Christ has held up to us as the rule of life.

If the Unitarian readers of this statement feel that they can fully assent to these propositions, does it not follow that they should, as a body, as well as individually, throw themselves thoroughly into the movement which seeks to abolish war and to bring about the settlement of disputes by juridical methods?

Yet, the long-standing traditions, prejudices, and personal interests which tell in favour of militarism lead men to oppose this great change in human affairs. It therefore needs unceasing and widespread efforts to overcome these false conceptions, which are as ancient as man and pervade the world. The vast mass of unthinking persons in all classes of society, especially those who are in high places, need to be converted to the truth of this matter. An entire revolution in men's ideas is demanded by their highest interests; but that cannot be effected without persistent, energetic and widespread efforts, involving great labour and self-sacrifice. A reform so great as this demands the burning faith and unselfish devotion without which no great reforms have ever been carried.

Such an appeal may fitly be made to Unitarians, not only on the ethical and religious grounds indicated at the beginning of this letter, but because Unitarians have always recognised the principle that faith without works is dead, and that the truth of a religious doctrine must be tested by the extent to which it influences daily life; that no mere professions of or assent to creeds are worth anything in themselves, except in so far as they lead to the unwearied service of God, as shown in the service of man.

It must be left to each man or woman to decide how he or she, according to the circumstances of each case, shall engage in the active prosecution of this great and holy work of promoting the reign of Peace and therefore of Justice.

To most it will naturally occur that they should join, support and co-operate with one of the existing Peace societies, most of which have always had to struggle against a discouraging and discreditable apathy on the part of the public. Most of the societies have had entirely inadequate support, in the shape either of members, of workers, or of money. I would, therefore, venture to suggest that any person impressed by the serious nature of this claim should make himself or herself acquainted with the aims and scheme of work adopted by the several societies.

It should, perhaps, be pointed out here that the Peace Conference at The Hague makes it more necessary even than before that those who desire the establishment of international arbitration and international unity, as well as a reduction of armaments, should organise themselves throughout Europe more effectively than ever. That Conference has created a widespread and justifiable belief in the possibility of realising those aims, to an extent never before conceived. Moreover, the probability of the establishment of a permanent High Court of Arbitration will make it the duty of every people to urge its own Government to resort to that

Court, and to see that it does not evade recourse to it by any plea that the question at issue is not suitable for such reference. Without strong and effective organisation, such pressure would often prove inadequate in the face of military and aristocratic opposition, and of the prejudices in favour of a sham Imperialism and of military adventure.

May I, in conclusion, call attention to a publication which may be said to have special claims upon your notice? I refer to the journal Concord, the monthly organ of the International Arbitration and Peace Association. During the last twelve months its editor has been Mr. G. H. Perris, whose name is deservedly familiar to most of you.

The power, brilliancy, and force with which that gentleman has, in its pages, pleaded for the great cause, has completely altered the character of the journal, entitling it to public attention and to the support of all who desire the abolition of war. The present writer is all the more entitled to bear tribute to the remarkable character given to this journal by Mr. Perris, in that he has himself contributed regularly to its pages for many years. The journal is published at a price within the reach of all—namely, half-a-crown a year, and it is really a matter of public importance that Concord should become widely read and circulated. Mr. Perris has also, through his personal influence and journalistic connections, secured contributions of great value from other writers, both in prose and verse, from men of mark who have thus added to the value of the paper.

It should here be pointed out that this journal, like the Association of which it is the organ, has always sought to be international in its character. By this it is meant that an effort has always been made to estimate, with thorough impartiality and fullness, all the various questions which threaten the maintenance of peace, and to enable English readers to understand the points of view entertained by other nations. It has, for many years, received communications from foreign colleagues; and, for these reasons, the articles in Concord have obtained cordial praise from public writers and the friends of peace on the Continent. Its impartiality and breadth of view have commanded confidence abroad as well as at home.

Our journal has, therefore, served to promote mutual esteem and friendship between the peace-makers of different countries. That, indeed, has always been one of the primary objects of the International Arbitration and Peace Association.

It is hoped that any person who may be influenced by the above statement, and desires to receive and circulate copies of Concord, will communicate with Mr. J. F. Green, Secretary of this Association, at 40, Outer Temple, W.C.—Yours heartily,
HODGSON PRATT, President.

P.S.—Subscriptions of £2 2s. 0d. a year would enable forty persons, ministers, libraries, and heads of societies, to receive one copy monthly.

WOOLWICH LOAN PICTURE EXHIBITION.

SIR,—A large number of working people in Woolwich having expressed a wish that a Loan Picture Exhibition should be held in Woolwich, we are taking steps to carry this into effect.

The Executive Committee trust that sympathisers with movements for bringing high-class pictures to crowded working class districts will assist this work, by lending pictures, and by inducing their friends to do so.

The necessary guarantee has been generously given by Mrs. Phillips, Castle House, Shooter's Hill, but the Executive hope that a small charge for admission, together with the proceeds of a few high-class concerts and lectures, which will be given during the exhibition, will meet the expenses incurred.

The pictures will be insured for the full value placed on them by their owners. Every care will be taken in the transit, the Executive Committee having resolved, in this matter, to follow the advice of those who have had experience in organising similar exhibitions.

Through the generosity of the Governors, the exhibition will be held in the Woolwich Polytechnic, a building constructed with every safeguard against fire.

If you are able to help in this matter, may we ask you to communicate with either of us at your earliest convenience.

THE ABORIGINES PROTECTION SOCIETY.

SIR,—May we be allowed to appeal through your columns to those who approve the objects of this Society for the financial support of which it is in great need?

The work of the Society consists chiefly in collecting information as to the condition and treatment of the natives of more or less uncivilised countries under British control or influence. The zeal of pioneers and promoters of civilisation sometimes causes indifference to the rights of natives; and cruelty and hardship have frequently been exposed and restrained through the Society's action in prompting the Government or Parliament to take the necessary steps.

But this work, though most of it unpaid, cannot be carried on without some outlay, for which the Society's present income of £400 a year or less is quite insufficient. We therefore venture to ask your readers to help us.

THE "MASK OF COMUS."

A HAPPY fortune attended the performance of Milton's "Mask of Comus" at Hampstead last Saturday. It was a perfect evening, with clear sunny air, and the grounds of Upper Heath, so kindly lent by Mr. I. S. Lister and the Misses Lister for the performance, were most admirably adapted and delightful for the purpose. It is true that the occasional rumble of passing carts would not let us quite forget that we were still in town, but there was no other drawback to the unmixed enjoyment of the spectators, and we may be bold to say that the pleasure of those who took part in the "Mask," and especially in the frolic of the country dances, was not less.

The circle of trees about the level lawn added a wonderful charm to the scene, and there was no need of further stage embellishments. Flitting forms behind the bushes and on hidden paths among the trees only added expectation to the interest of what was going on. The orchestra, conducted by Miss Maud Turner, and led by Miss Winifred Robinson, was placed on one side of the lawn, and too much cannot be said in acknowledgment of the pains that had been taken in arranging the music. The songs of the Spirit and the Lady's Echo song were the original music by Henry Lawes, while the songs of Comus and Sabrina were by Dr. Arne. The Morris dance was to a tune of the time of Elizabeth, and the rest of the music was in thorough keeping with the spirit of the piece.

The "Mask" began with an overture, after which the Attendant Spirit (Miss Annie Lawrence) appeared, clad in "pure ambrosial weeds," and gliding out from among the trees declaimed in clear and measured tones the opening speech. It was a relief not to be subjected to too gruesome a shock when after this Comus and his crew appeared. The part of Comus was played by Mr. Savage Cooper with great skill and sufficient realism, but his "rout of monsters" were a company of jolly little imps and youthful masqueraders, who could be watched with a chuckle of amusement, yet without any loss to the great central purpose of the poem. The part of the Lady was most admirably represented by Mrs. Herbert Teasdale, and after the brothers' dramatic rescue of their sister the happy intervention of "Sabrina fair," with "twisted braids of lilies knitting the loose train of amber-dropping hair," and the release of the chained Lady, furnished not the least beautiful episode in the piece.

After an interval for refreshments, which were most refreshing, in another part of the garden, the concluding scene of the "Mask" was presented, as in the grounds of Ludlow Castle in 1634. First came the country dances, full of the abandon of hearty enjoyment, Mr. E. P. Jewitt, as the Jester, playing a very merry part. Then appeared the Earl and Countess of Bridgewater (Mr. A. H. Biggs and Mrs. Blake Odgers), magnificently attired, and yet more impressive with a natural and stately dignity, to whom, surrounded by their attendant gentlemen and ladies, the Spirit presented their children, the rescued Lady and her brothers.

Then followed other dances, a Gavotte most seriously danced with infinite grace, and a Morris dance, in which Mr. Frank Odgers as Friar Tuck, Miss Sykes as Maid Marian, and Mr. Herbert Teasdale as the Hobby Horse, caused much amusement. Nor must we forget the part of the glee singers, who appeared from among the trees, singing without accompaniment "Hail Smiling Morn" and other pieces with very beautiful effect.

The "Mask" was produced under the management of Mr. Savage Cooper, Miss Tayler, and Mr. Macrae Moir, and they, and in fact all who were concerned in the performance, are to be heartily congratulated on the great success achieved. Most of the dresses were specially designed for the occasion, some were made by the performers themselves, and a good many by sewing parties of ladies meeting at Essex Hall. The managers had the advantage of professional assistance from Miss Fanny Marriott and Miss Alice Chapin at some of the rehearsals. The number of the spectators was also gratifying, and a substantial contribution will be made to the London Unitarian Bazaar Fund, in aid of which the performance was given. After payment of all expenses, it is expected that the balance will not be less than £60. The thanks of the promoters of the Fund were offered at the conclusion of the "Mask" by Dr. Blake Odgers to the performers, and to Mr. I. S. Lister and the Misses Lister, for their great kindness in allowing the use of their grounds. A strong desire was generally expressed that the performance might be repeated; but we regret to hear that it has been found impossible to make the necessary arrangements, at any rate for this summer.

THE MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE annual meetings were held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, July 6, under the presidency of the Rev. S. THOMPSON. The day's proceedings commenced as usual with a Communion service, conducted by the Revs. S. THOMPSON and W. R. SHANKS, and a devotional service conducted by the Rev. J. C. HIRST.

After the roll was called, the PRESIDENT delivered his address, in the course of which he said there was still work for us to do, in spite of the fact that in many churches and chapels the old orthodoxy has vanished and a reasonable Christianity has taken its place. There is a growing feeling in the Churches that the old theology must be remodelled; and as the outcome, a New Catechism has been prepared and published. It is an improvement on the old one; but it is still only a compromise. Oriental exploration and discovery which carry us back into the past must bring about a change in thought and belief. The pivot upon which the religion of the future must turn is authority. It was so at Rome and Geneva alike; the infallible Church found its antagonist in the infallible Bible; and now a wider issue has to be decided. It is now Rome or reason; the final authority of the Roman Catholic Church or the final authority of the human soul. External authority with power behind it means persecution and the crushing of all freedom of thought. They must stand fast to the principle of perfect freedom in search of truth, and of perfect devotion to the cause of humanity. They had long been pioneers in the cause of truth, clearing the ground of ignorance, bigotry and superstition, and the arduous task was not yet done.

The President appointed for the ensuing year is the Rev. W. W. Robinson, of Gainsborough; also the Rev. J. C. Hirst, treasurer, the Rev. W. R. Shanks, secretary, and the Rev. W. Lancaster, auditor. New members admitted were the Revs. N. Anderton, W. E. George, J. Howard, T. Robinson, and W. G. Tarrant. An expression of sympathy was sent to the Rev. George Ride, who is at present suffering from a serious and painful illness. The following resolutions were also passed:—

1. That this Conference records with regret the death of the Rev. R. Spears as a hearty and earnest worker in the cause of Unitarianism, and instructs that a message of regret and sympathy be sent to Mrs. Spears and family.

2. That the members of this Missionary Conference rejoice in the assembly of the representatives of the nations of the world at The Hague to devise means of settling international disputes by the establishment of a permanent Tribunal of Arbitration, and by the adoption of measures to minimise the horrors of war, when nations have failed to settle their disputes by arbitration. This Conference prays for God's blessing on this great attempt to realise "peace on earth and goodwill among men."

It was reported that the congregation at Douglas had sold their chapel, and had handed over the bulk of the money to the trustees. It was also announced that out of last year's Conference, and largely through the personal labours of the Rev. C. J. Street, a Ministerial Fellowship has been formed which starts with an inaugural membership of eighty-two drawn from all parts of the United Kingdom. This is not intended to be a Provident Society, but a means of affording assistance to unfortunate brother ministers whose interregnum between pulpit and pulpit may be long and trying.

At the afternoon meeting the Rev. S. SIDAWAY BRETTTELL, M.A., read a suggestive paper on "Our Mission to the People." The gospel of Unitarianism: what is it? It lays hold of the central truths of Christianity and presents them to our minds in their simplicity and purity. God is spirit: man is spirit—are the two truths on which the superstructure of Christianity is reared; in other words, the personality of God and man is the basis of Christianity. "All minds are of the same family" is the manner in which Channing expressed the same truth. God is incarnate in man: man's personality is of the same kind as God's. Man is the centre of eternal attributes. In so far as man possesses these attributes, so far he is like God. Justice in man is the same quality as justice in God: love in man is the same quality as love in God: man is the possessor of God-like attributes. And so man can receive messages from God, can hold communion with God, can imitate God. The ideal of Christianity is that man shall freely and completely surrender his spirit to God. For this a continuity of personal existence is necessary, that he may fill out the measure of his being, that he may attain to spiritual oneness with God, and live his true life. Such is Christianity, and such is Unitarianism. There is no more probability of Unitarianism reverting to Trinitarianism than there is of astronomers discarding the theory of Copernicus for that of Ptolemæus. As members of the freest Churches in existence, we are desirous of extending our help and sympathy to all classes of believers and unbelievers; and if they can find aids to a holier life in our services we shall be glad to give those aids; but Unitarianism is a religious movement, and no man who frankly admits that theological questions are indifferent to him, or who holds that definite theological knowledge is unattainable, has a right to ask that any congregation connected with the National Conference should elect him to minister to it. Unitarianism means neither sacerdotalism nor agnosticism. One of the most urgent duties in our mission to the people is to dispel the too prevalent notion that Unitarianism is religion reduced to its lowest terms, that it is next to no religion: this is one of the chief obstacles to our progress. Are we quite sure that in the past we have been faithful to our principles, and that we have taken pains to use every opportunity of making our faith known? I know the name Unitarian is one of reproach; but I do not think we should gain by a change of name, and I am not clear that it would be right to change our name, even if gain were probable. Any name which differentiates our position from that of other Churches will be equally objectionable.

Our work is not done, though our heaven is working in the other Churches. A Unitarian who does not confess his Unitarianism and glory in it, is only half a Unitarian, and he has laid hold of the less important half at that, whether he be a teacher or a hearer. Unitarianism is more than an intellectual aspect of religion: it is a gospel on fire with love of God and man. It is concerned with the uplifting of man in every sphere of thought and conduct. Men cannot tamper with truth in one department of life, and especially in the most sacred department of life, and expect to go unscathed in every other; and it is equally important that man should be honest in his relation to man as in his relation to God. To see men afraid to think freely for fear of the consequences; to see men bound in chains of superstition and paganism under the name of Christianity; to see men hugging their chains as though their soul's salvation depended on them; to see such teachings drying up the fountains of human affection and sympathy; to see the unworthy compliances and the ingenious evasions made by men who are fitted for nobler work; and then to speak of the absence of motive for missionary effort, is to be blind to the vision of man's origin and destiny, and deaf to the calls and messages of God.

We have also a duty to those outside the Churches, and to the children in our Sunday-schools, of whom there are over 30,000, most of whom are children of the working-classes. We must train them to regular attendance; must give them our highest and best thoughts on sacred subjects. At present I know nothing sweeter and grander than Unitarianism, when I do I shall teach them that, and if it be under a different name that will not trouble me. But vagueness of aim and laziness in thought mean weakness, and most of our liberalism is weak because it is vague and lazy. We must put our strongest available forces into the Sunday-school, and ministers must lay hold of the children.

The discussion was opened by the Rev. W. E. ATTACK, and engaged in by the Revs. H. B. SMITH, J. RUDDLE, W. HARRISON, J. C. STREET, C. PEACH, and others; and the following resolution, moved by the Rev. H. B. SMITH, was carried.

That the Committee be instructed to arrange at the next annual meeting for the consideration of those social problems which most closely affect the realisation of our mission as Liberal Christians.

The members afterwards had tea together, and spent a pleasant evening in proposing and responding to various appropriate toasts.

THE SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meetings of this Association were held in the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, on Wednesday, July 5. There was a good attendance of ministers and friends. Among those present were the Revs. E. C. BENNETT, Southampton; C. C. COE, F.G.S., Bournemouth; E. S. ANTHONY, M.A., Poole; J. Wilkins, Wareham; C. A. HODDINOTT, Chichester; C. E. PIKE, Newport; G. C. PRIOR and T. BOND, Portsmouth; J. C. CONWAY, Ringwood; W. WHITTAKER, B.A., Leicester; Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, London; and Messrs. H. BLESSLEY and F. PINNOCK.

The proceedings opened with a business meeting at 11 A.M.

The service commenced at 12, conducted by the Rev. E. S. ANTHONY, M.A., and the sermon was preached by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, of Birmingham, whose subject was "Truthfulness in Religion."

After luncheon the business meeting was held at 3 P.M., and was marked by uncommonly promising reports from the various neighbouring churches. The annual reports were adopted and the officers re-elected.

The event of the afternoon was the proposal by the Rev. C. E. PIKE to commence a Twentieth Century Fund. This was adopted after some discussion as to the proposed amount. The Rev. E. C. BENNETT suggested a thousand pounds. The Rev. C. C. COE took the opportunity by the forelock, and succeeded in gathering promises amounting to about £275.

The tea at five o'clock was crowded, and a good public meeting followed at seven.

The Chairman, Mr. J. COGAN CONWAY, opened the meeting by saying that he was glad to be in the town hallowed by memories of Isaac Watts and Edmund Kell. He took the first opportunity of congratulating the Church on the settlement among them of the Rev. E. C. BENNETT, a man of resource and a happy gift of expression. It was no time for Unitarians to be lax. The future called for them. Signs of change and unrest were on every hand. The Established Church was shaken to its foundations. With its Protestant articles, Popish liturgy, Erastian constitution, and sacerdotal pretensions, it could not last much longer. And when the change came, whose would the inheritance be if not ours—the logical possessors of the Protestant tradition. Among Nonconformists there was a tendency in our direction. The old catechism gave place to a new one, which was an enormous advance on the former one. What was the meaning of the stress being laid on the humanity of Jesus in a certain modern novel? It pointed to a sense of unsafety—a want of trust in the old dogmas—and was a movement of thought which would go much further.

The Rev. C. E. PIKE, speaking on the "Duty of Public Worship," said it ought rather to be a delight, and would be so when people realised how much worship could do for them especially in promoting communal life.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD opened with a reference to the Irishman who said that before he began he should like to say a few words. Dr. Fairbairn had said that the extremely poor and rich were alienated from religion. That was not true now, for we were in times of revival. Agnosticism was but an echo of itself, while the evangelical Churches were never so prosperous as now. The priestly idea might die, but the Church idea would live and flourish because it met the needs of the soul. Wherever there was a desire for union—aspersion after higher things and a sense of the unseen—there would the Church naturally grow. The changed times changed the Church's methods. Now, all kinds of social and intellectual movements were popular, and were developed within the Church until the minister was in danger of becoming merely a business man, and the Church a social agency rather than a home of rest. However useful all these things might be, it must be religious or it would be nothing. The Church's first duty was to keep alive faith in God and the soul, and strengthen the will. It should encourage the strong and help the dying.

Mr. G. C. PRIOR argued that heretical members of other Churches did not care to leave precious associations, and clung to exploded dogmas from fear that if they gave them up no others might be found.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE brought friendly greetings from London, and, in a genial speech, explained the relationship existing between the country churches and the B. and F.U.A.

The Rev. E. C. BENNETT thanked those who come to see them, and help them. The B. and F.U.A. especially deserved their thanks. It might, however, take a little advice from experienced provincial ministers, and not simply send money into the provinces but men. Money sometimes assisted, but as often hindered churches, while the occasional presence of a friendly stranger never failed to have a good effect. If a visitor from the parent society were to turn up in some of our country churches on a Sunday morning, the surprise would be mutual and instructive. It was a mistake to suppose that Churches flourished on pecuniary generosity—ours were in many instances dying on it. The Ark of God was not rolled on golden wheels, but carried on human shoulders.

Mr. F. ISTD joined in thanking all who had come to Southampton, and so helped to make the meetings a success. Much sympathy was expressed with the honoured Secretary, Mr. H. BLESSLEY, in his recent break down in health. His appearance at the meetings was welcomed, and the hope was expressed that he would soon be quite restored.

THE strength of the affection is a proof, not of the worthiness of the object, but of the largeness of the soul that loves.—F. W. Robertson.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare.—The annual picnic of the Highland-place Sunday-school took place on Thursday last amid glorious weather. The party, about sixty in number, drove in brakes to Pantycynfarth Farm, Penderyn, by kind permission of Mrs. Rhys, Synborfawr, and there, among the grey mountains of Breconshire, a most delightful day was spent.

Atherton: Chowbent Chapel.—The school sermons were preached here on Sunday last, in the morning by the Rev. J. J. Wright, minister of the chapel, and in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. Professor Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Oxford. There were large gatherings at all the services, and the actual collections on the day amounted to £62 17s. 6d., an increase of about £10 on last year.

Chester.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held in Matthew Henry's Chapel, when addresses were given to the children. The chapel was decorated with flowers, and the attendances and collections were greater than in any recent year. After next Sunday the chapel will be closed for restoration, and morning service held in the schoolroom.

Coseley.—In connection with the centenary of the Old Meeting Sunday-school, the celebration of which we reported last week, a special fund was raised with the object of renovating the schoolroom, decorating the chapel, and, if possible, providing an organ to replace the harmonium which has been in use since the present church was built, nearly a quarter of a century ago. The congregation subscribed liberally, according to its means, and donations were received from old scholars and former teachers of the Sunday-school, now residing in other parts of the country. Amongst other donations was one of five guineas from the Right Hon. J. Chamberlain. The fund was supplemented by entertainments given by the choir, and the cordial fellowship of the Wesleyans, Baptists, and other denominations, was shown by the granting of the free use of their schoolrooms in aid of the movement. The effort was successful so far as to enable the committee to renovate and beautify the schoolroom, and to clean and decorate the chapel, but the response has not been sufficient to complete the object of providing an organ. At the services on Sunday week the collections realised nearly £25.

East London Sunday-school Union.—The annual service of the united schools of this society was held at Mansford-street Chapel on Sunday afternoon, July 9. The Sunday-schools of Forestgate, Hackney, Mansford-street, Stepney, and Walthamstow, were represented, and the body of the chapel was comfortably filled. The service, which consisted of special hymns sung by the united schools, a sermon, and children's address, was conducted by the Rev. W. G. Cadman.

Glasgow: South St. Mungo-street.—The Literary Committee have just arranged and catalogued a fine collection of theological and philosophical books, presented, along with a bookcase, by Mrs. John Brownlee, as a memorial of her father. The collection was opened on Sunday, July 2, to the use of the members, and will no doubt be largely taken advantage of. The bookcase bears the following inscription:—"These books being part of his library were presented to South St. Mungo-street Unitarian Christian Church, in memory of James Russell, who was a member from its beginning till his death, January 12, 1899."

Liscard.—The annual Congregational picnic took place on Saturday last, when some fifty members and friends spent a most enjoyable afternoon and evening at Helsby. The weather being perfect, a splendid view of the surrounding district was obtained from the top of the hills. The arrangements for the comfort of the party were in the hands of Messrs. Hollinshead and Rowlands, and high appreciation of the way in which they were carried out was expressed by all present.

London: Bermondsey.—The sixth annual excursion of the Band of Hope took place on Saturday last, when, thanks to the generosity of several friends, a day was spent at Southend, greatly to the delight of the children. The weather was everything that could be desired, and railway and tea arrangements were highly satisfactory, the whole outing proving an unqualified success, to be long remembered by all privileged to enjoy it.

London: Essex Church.—The annual sermon on behalf of the Provincial Assembly was preached last Sunday morning by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston; the collections amounted to £41 11s. 6d. The annual flower service took place in the afternoon, and was attended by a large congregation of parents and children, who heartily joined in the special singing. The offerings of plants and fruits, which were again numerous, were afterwards distributed to the local hospitals, each of which has sent a grateful acknowledgment. An interesting address was delivered by Mr. J. H. Woods, B.A., of Oxford. At the evening service Mr. Freeston continues his addresses on "Saints and Churches of Italy."

Lydgate.—A bazaar was held on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, July 6, 7, and 8, being opened by Mr. J. S. Mathers, J.P., of Leeds. Mr. Mathers, in his address, warmly commended the efforts of the Lydgate people to put their historic chapel and parsonage into thoroughly good condition, and pressed them, when that was done, not to relax, but to set to work to secure the erection of a new school to replace the present one, which is far too small for ordinary requirements. The Rev. A. Chalmers strongly supported this suggestion, and added that the new building should have associated with it the name of Oliver Heywood, who did much to found the congregation, and preached the first sermons in the chapel in 1695. The Rev. J. Hanson Green, B.A. (minister), and Mr. D. Haigh also spoke. The proceeds of the bazaar amounted to £69 2s. 9d., which, with the donations towards the renovation scheme, make a total of £180 11s. 9d.; £300 was the sum desired for the complete carrying out of the scheme.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Last Sunday evening Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal preached in the Church of the Divine Unity on "India's Message to England and the West." In the course of an eloquent address, Mr. Pal said that England was in India to accomplish God's purpose, and that purpose was to create a new gospel—a gospel of absolute faith and of the imminence of God. That was represented by the Brahmo Somaj, the outcome of the union with the West. That was a new movement, and yet, at the same time, it was an old movement. The truths they were proclaiming to-day were found in the ancient scriptures of the people of India. The unity of God and man: that was their highest gospel—in their protests against polytheism, and idolatry, and against the popular superstitions of their people. They were bringing the people back to those old teachings. The movement was started in the early part of the century, and was growing. The foundation of their faith was intuition. Their literature was the book of man and the book of nature. They accepted no written book as infallible; they regarded religious literature as the records of periods of the past, and recognised the value of such records in human religion and spiritual culture. They had done the pioneer work. They believed in one God, who was in the soul of every man. No man was without the light of God, either patent or latent. Some were more conscious of it, some less; and by culture, by discipline, by prayer, by ethical and moral culture, they would gradually rise to recognise their great inheritance as children of God.

Newtownards.—On the last Sunday of June a flower service was held in the First Presbyterian Church, under the direction of the Rev. R. M. King. The service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. S. H. Mellone, of Holywood, who preached from Mark iv. 26, on "The Mystery of Growth and the Kingdom of God." The flowers were afterwards sent to the infirmary.

Park Lane, near Wigan.—On Sunday evening, June 18, a meeting was held to consider the formation of a society, to be known as "The Guild of the Good Samaritan." The Rev. J. E. Stead presided, and explained the scheme of work that might be carried on in connection with the guild. It was afterwards resolved that such a guild be formed, and that a further meeting be held to arrange for the different classes that can be immediately organised. The adjourned meeting was held on Sunday evening, July 2, the chair being taken by Dr. Winstanley. After a short devotional service the chairman referred to the declared object of the guild, and, in a very sympathetic speech, emphasised the unselfish nature of the pledge. The object of the guild is stated to be "to encourage one another in applying to daily life and its varied needs the great truths of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man"; and the pledge which the guild members sign is—"I do hereby promise to do all in my power, during the following twelve months, to render useful service to others, in obedience to the command, 'Go and do thou likewise.'" Over sixty members enrolled themselves. Arrangements are made for elementary and advanced arithmetic classes, including mining arithmetic, a geology class, and singing class; and a committee is arranging for a cricket and lawn tennis club. Several of the young men have come forward in the Band of Hope and Band of Mercy work; and an Adult Temperance Society is likewise formed in connection with the Guild.

Richmond.—The July Calendar of the Ormond-road Free Church contains the following note by the Rev. S. Farrington:—"I gladly announce on this Calendar the extinction of our building debt. The efforts of our little congregation, aided by the generosity, often repeated—and sometimes unexpected—of friends, have at last accomplished this object, in which we have so deep an interest. We have had our hours of timidity, nervousness, and anxiety, and sometimes they have got the better of us. But on the whole we have had faith, and courage, and hope enough to keep us working and trying, and I suppose that is all we need, and all we ought to expect in any undertaking—enough to keep us going; the day's strength for the day's burden. This Calendar will come into the hands, I hope, of everyone who has helped us in building this church. I want to express to each of these our grateful thanks for their kindness. Many times their timely assistance has come in a discouraged moment, and has cheered us; often it has been beyond what we dared to hope; always it has been more than we deserved. Without their help we certainly could not have built our church at all. We feel that we owe a lasting debt, which will never be wiped out, to all these friends who, from personal affection or from attachment to our common faith have given or done anything to help us in our struggle. And while we are glad and grateful in the completion of this special work, let us remind ourselves that there is never any such thing as getting through with God's work. We can never say it is finished. This or that bit of work gets done, and God is no such hard master as to grudge us our moment of rejoicing in it. But also He never wills that we should settle down on our accomplishment and fold our hands. He has always further labours, further opportunities, further sacrifices—yes, and further rewards before us. And all that has been done is only so much vantage ground for further efforts. And in seizing these opportunities and in making these endeavours do we, indeed, approve ourselves as those good and faithful servants who enter into His joy."

Saffron Walden.—On the 9th inst. the 80th anniversary of the Sunday-school of the General Baptist Chapel was held. The morning service was conducted by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, who preached a special sermon on "The Teacher's Conception of the Word of God." For the evening: "Floral Praise Series, No. 16," had been obtained from Chicago, entitled, "A Greeting to the Flowers, a service for Children's Day, May, 1899; told in Song, Dialogue, Recitation, and Scripture Readings." Published by the Biglow and Main Company. The service was very ably rendered in all its thirty sections. The collections were well in advance of last year. The organ loft, pulpit, and centre-table were beautifully arranged with flowers. Miss Brinkworth presided at the organ.

MATTHEW HENRY'S CHAPEL, CHESTER.

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION FUND.

The roof and ceiling of the Ancient Chapel (1700) are now dangerous. The architects recommend entirely new ones. Much dilapidated in other respects, renovation is urgently needed. The cost of these restorations will be £750, or more. Towards this sum the congregation and trustees, with some old members and friends, have subscribed £340, which may be increased. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has given £50.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN this fervid summer weather happy are they who can be idle in the open country. The prisoners of hope still kept in town refresh themselves with the thought of those who have escaped, and are fled as a bird to the mountains, or hear the beat of the ocean upon some welcome shore. It is pleasant to have news of those who have sailed for Norway, or are seeking the great heights of Switzerland. And nearer at hand in many lovely retreats, rest and quiet companionship are to be found. Would that the city could be lifted bodily into some cool sea! But meanwhile, in the quiet night a lamp will burn even in the veriest patch of garden—there are some breaths of cooler, fresher air, and it is possible to do some work.

THE Special Services Committee have now completed their arrangements with the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke for various preaching engagements beginning in October next. From Oct. 8 to Nov. 12 inclusive, he will preach at Little Portland-street Chapel, on Sunday mornings. He will also preach at each of the following places:—Burnley, Chester, Hull, Mansford-street (London), Oldham, Oxford, Padiham, Platt (Manchester), Rochdale, Swansea, Wandsworth (London), and Warrington. From Nov. 16 to Dec. 4 Mr. Brooke will be in Scotland preaching and lecturing at Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow. From the middle of February to the end of May, 1900, Mr. Brooke will be abroad. For six Sundays, beginning May 27 and ending July 1, he will again preach in London.

All communications in reference to these engagements should be addressed to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C., and not to Mr. Brooke personally.

THE Wesleyan Conference has been meeting this week in the renovated Wesley Chapel in the City-road. It is the 156th annual Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. On Tuesday the Rev. F. W. Macdonald was elected President, in succession to the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes. Mr. Macdonald, who is the biographer of Morley Punshion, is the son of a Wesleyan minister, and was born at Leeds in 1842. In 1862 he entered the ministry, and, after successful service in several places, became for ten years professor of Theology at the Handsworth College, Birmingham. For the last eight years he has been Secretary to the Missionary Society. The new President, in the course of his address, expressed his thankfulness that Methodists were at peace among themselves and on excellent terms with other Churches. The theory of their ministry was sound. They were as far removed from Sacerdotalism as from anarchy: from Rome on the one hand or Plymouth on the other. Their ministers were neither the slaves nor the taskmasters of the people. As for their relations with the Church of England, he was not despondent; indeed, they were anxious to participate in its Evangelical and spiritual life, when it had tired of looking for more recognition from Rome. He also pleaded for a higher standard of pastoral efficiency, and notably a higher standard of education, "a steady lifting up" of ourselves, for if we are to draw to us the choicest spirits of Methodism we must give them the advantages of a thoroughly educated ministry.

A MEMORIAL from the Board School Defence Society against the use of the modified Free Church catechism adopted by the Liverpool School Board has been sent to the Education Department. It declares that the system of religious instruction in the Board-schools is substantially the same as that which was adopted at the formation of the Board; while the adopted catechism is considered to be denominational, and its introduction has been opposed by the Liverpool Evangelical Free Church Committee, by various other Nonconformist bodies, and by the three Roman Catholic members of the Liverpool School Board. The Committee of Council are asked to disapprove the introduction of a catechism into the Board-schools, and to declare that the catechism referred to in the Board's resolution is a contravention of Section 14 (b) of the Elementary Education Act, 1870. The memorial is signed by Canon Lester (Chairman of the Board), Archdeacon Taylor, and several other clergymen, as well as by Wesleyans, Unitarians, Presbyterians, and other Non-conformists.

WRITING on "The Mediæval Sunday" in the current number of the Nineteenth Century, Father Thurston, S.J., gives a very interesting account of the early customs both as to the Saturday half-holiday and Sunday itself. "In condemning the seven-day newspaper," he says, "and in maintaining equivalently the seventh-day concert, the public opinion of this country has drawn a rather delicate distinction, but one which, I venture to think, would have commended itself alike to the wisdom and to the religious feeling of our forefathers." And the article concludes by saying that the spirit of the mediæval Sunday "is well summed up in the Scriptural introduction of the canticle regarded of old as peculiarly appropriate to that day—the Gloria in Excelsis Deo: 'Glory be to God on High and on earth peace to men of good will.'" The praise of God must occupy the first place, but, that being secured, the Church thought next of man's physical and moral well-being—rest of body, peace of soul, and all that makes for charity and good will between class and class.

FATHER THURSTON, in the course of his article, tells a story with a moral interesting in another connection. Towards the close of 1200, when Hugh Bishop of Lincoln was returning home from a pilgrimage to the Grande Chartreuse, passing through Normandy, he rested for a day at St. Omer, where an extraordinary prodigy was brought to his notice, over which the people were greatly excited. A certain baker drawing a batch of loaves from his oven on a Monday morning, one of them dropped and was broken, and blood flowed out. Others were then cut into, and blood similarly flowed. That, said the chaplain, was because the bread had been kneaded on the Sunday, and God had marked by that miracle His horror of the infraction of the law of rest. A batch of unleavened bread, prepared in the evening of the Sabbath after vespers, where there had been no breach of the law, had shown no similar sign. On this Father Thurston remarks :—

There seems no reason to question the exactitude of the facts, which are vouched for by an eye-witness whose reputation for conscientious truthfulness stands very high. Such phenomena have been repeatedly recorded both by pagan authors in classical times and by scientific observers in the present century. The liquid which flows from the bread is not of course blood, but an excess of moisture which has been deeply stained by a rapid growth of some one of the pigment microbes, notably the bacillus prodigiosus, so called from its startling resemblance to the colour of blood. Excess of moisture and the admixture of yeast seem to be necessary conditions for the full development of this phenomenon, which occurs, nevertheless, quite sporadically and unaccountably. It is noteworthy that a scientific commission, appointed by the French Government to examine and report upon some similar appearances in a batch of bread supplied to the French army about fifty years ago, record as a result of actual experiment that while the discoloration was very marked in the fermented bread made from a particular specimen of flour, the unleavened biscuits and cakes made from the same flour were perfectly clean and wholesome.

The principle underlying these remarks of the Jesuit Father we should be glad to see carried out consistently in the case of all ecclesiastical and other ancient miracle stories.

THE subject of the Rev. C. Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit is "The Ways of God: a Lesson from a Game of Chess." Writing of it in the July Chapel Record, Mr. Hargrove says:—"It is an endeavour to prove by a familiar illustration our inevitable inability to understand God's government of the world. If we confess this, we shall be set free of the difficulty which troubles so many good souls, that they cannot reconcile God's goodness and power with all the evil they see within and around them. We shall no more be obliged to find excuses and make apology for God's ways, but be content that 'His ways are not our ways.' I do not know how far I may be indebted for the illustration to a paper, entitled The Sceptical Pawn, which appeared, some twenty-five years ago, in a volume of "Biblical Illustrations," by the late Rev. Samuel Cox. Nor does it matter. We are all debtors, and borrow consciously or unconsciously of one another most of our best things, and, at least, the germs of all that we conceive or say. When we know to whom we owe any striking thought, we should give the author thanks and credit him with it. But, in general, we cannot tell, save that nothing of worth would be ours, were it not for what we have learnt of our fellow-men."

ENTERING on the sixth year of his ministry at the Charing Cross Unitarian Church, Birkenhead, on July 2 the Rev. James Crossley preached a sermon on "The Condition of Success in Religious Life," which, by request, has been published. Referring to the loss of valued members during the past years, Mr. Crossley said:—

I sometimes think that the older generation were more faithful and devoted to their church than the younger generation seem to be. They saw the fateful struggle for religious liberty when the issue was doubtful; they experienced the stern pressure of intolerance; they felt the absolute necessity for unflinching loyalty, and the experience left its mark upon them. The conditions are changed, but we must bear in mind that we have received the inheritance for which they laboured and suffered, and that we can only keep it by imitating their faithfulness. So that with the tenderness of the memory of our dead there is blended a deep respect for the unwavering steadiness of their testimony. And the best proof we can give that we have not forgotten those who are no longer with us is to make their example our inspiration, and to seek to add to the legacy they have left us.

And later, in the course of the sermon, speaking with frankness in the confidence of friendship, Mr. Crossley made a plea for a more serious devotion to the duties of church-membership. He had been startled, he said, when he first came to Birkenhead by the easy carelessness with which engagements connected with the church were made to give place to any other, and without any explanation or apology.

I need scarcely say that in society a practice of this sort would be described as "bad form," a charge from which every one who values social opinion shrinks. I confess that I do not see how the case is much better when the matter has to do with a church. It surely marks a low tone in the church when its institutions come last in the consideration of its members, and when they are satisfied to devote to it only the fag-ends of their time and thought. All the work done in connection with a church is, or ought to be, regarded as work for the cause of righteousness, even when an institution has a more or less secular colour. I am quite clear that no church can flourish when a state of things such as I have described exists. I plead, then, for greater loyalty to this church, and to all the agencies connected with it; for a more serious consideration of the place it ought to hold in your thoughts and in your lives.

THE Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association desire us to publish the following letter, which they have received from Professor George Boros. Any contributions which the English admirers of Dr. Brassai may desire to forward can be sent direct to Professor George Boros, Unitarian College, Kolozsvár, Hungary, or through the Secretary of the Association at Essex Hall.

"You will have heard of our grand old man, Dr. Samuel Brassai, who visited you in England, and was present at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1873. Dr. Brassai's friends and admirers have decided to raise a memorial to his memory, and they wish to give an opportunity to those who knew Dr. Brassai to contribute to this memorial. Dr. Brassai was a man of quite exceptional talent. It is really hard to tell in which branch of science he was strongest; for he was a philosopher, a linguist, a mathematician, a musician, a botanist, a critic, and a theologian. The son of a very clever Unitarian minister, he inherited the ideas of our simple Unitarian faith, which he was proud of all his life. He was Professor of the Unitarian College at Kolozsvár in the years 1837-1848, 1859-1861; and afterwards he acted as visitor to the same college. Though this is not a good time for collecting money, Dr. Brassai's name is a great attraction, and we hope we shall be able to collect the sum of £1,200. We wish to offer you English Unitarians an opportunity of giving something to the memorial.

THE friends and supporters of the Unitarian Movement at Auckland, New Zealand, are in earnest about the establishment of a church. They have decided to raise a substantial sum in aid of the minister's salary, and to give a guarantee for two or three years. The Mission Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are endeavouring to find an able, active, earnest, young minister, prepared to go out and take up the work in this very promising field. The Rev. R. H. Lambley, of Melbourne, who visited Auckland recently, is quite enthusiastic about the prospects. Mr. Lambley hopes that a minister will soon be sent out, and that he will visit Melbourne on the way to New Zealand.

AMONG our summer visitors is the Rev. Stanley M. Hunter, of the Unitarian Church, St. John, New Brunswick, who was ordained three years ago, and settled in his present charge last year. Mr. Hunter has preached at Gee-cross, Moss-side, and Altrincham, and his services have been much appreciated. After an absence of ten years, Mr. Hunter is on a visit to his parents in Manchester, and is returning early next month to St. John.

LADY MANFIELD, whose death we recorded last week, was for three years a member of the Northampton School Board, having been elected in 1877; but the chief activity of her life was in less public paths of ever active beneficence. In 1896 she laid the memorial stone of the new Kettering-road Church, the gift of Sir Philip Manfield and herself, and at the opening of the church in the following year, she wrote expressing the hope that its influence might always be in harmony with the most reverent thought of the age, and of the deepest needs of human nature, "so that from this building, as a centre, there may radiate the highest moral and spiritual influences; that the foundational principles of righteousness, of absolute fidelity to duty and conscience, and a large charity may be insisted on; and that the graces and sweet amenities of life may be here presented in so fair and attractive a setting that those who listen may be drawn as by a magnet to the endeavour after—if not the complete attainment of—that last touch of great character which only a high religious consecration can give to men and women. And further, as even these high aims and achievements will not fully satisfy our nature, which is dual, and fill our life, which is a divine discipline, we earnestly hope that the worship offered to the Great Supreme within these walls in spirit and in truth may be so simple, so earnest, and so intense, that the natural result may be an ever-increasing trust in God; a trust so abiding that no suffering, no sorrow, no calamity, may be able permanently to shake it; but that it may be fully equal to all the stress and strain of this so often troubled, perplexed, and sorely-tempted life. If these high aims are realised this Church will not have been erected in vain."

MAKE yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts. None of us yet know, for none of us have been taught in early youth, what fairy palaces we may build of beautiful thought—proof against all adversity. Bright fancies, satisfied memories, noble histories, faithful sayings, treasure houses of precious and restful thoughts, which care cannot disturb, nor pain make gloomy, nor poverty take away from us—houses built without hands, for our souls to live in.—Ruskin.

CARLYLE'S 'SARTOR RESARTUS.'

I.—SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

ALTHOUGH Thomas Carlyle is not usually set down as one of the writers of religious or devotional books, yet his "Sartor Resartus" appeals to me as a very powerful and inspired spiritual autobiography, in some respects specially fitted to help modern religious life, because the retirement and transcendental reverie to which it leads are such as may be attained in the midst of a busy world, while most time-honoured devotional books carry us away from active life into the cloister, and reduce the sphere of action to a very small part of the visible world.

There is something better than perversity in the method of Carlyle in this book, the mingling of biographical references to the imagined Teufelsdröckh with the "Editor's" patronising remarks, which give Carlyle the opportunity of playfully commenting upon himself and his own style and forestalling his critics. This and the side references to Heuschrecke, as well as many passages in the book in which keen satire on men and manners is rounded off and made genial and acceptable to the honest reader by sympathetic playfulness, should have taught readers of Carlyle long ago that he did not lack that element of greatness called humour, and should have assisted them in the interpretation of some of his later works. Carlyle's humour in "Sartor Resartus" is a fine example of the use of smiles in the teaching of great truths, and it never degenerates into funniness; that is to say, the thought comes clothed in a quaint but seemly garment which it has made for itself: there is no attempt to pin on an incongruous bright ribbon because of the prevailing gloomy colour of serious heaviness. Humour and imagination such as would stock the workshops of an average hundred ordinary novelists play about Carlyle's serious thoughts, and in "Sartor" produce an unexampled combination of novel, autobiography, satire, and religious philosophy, mingled all together in nearly every page of the book, and yet leaving no doubt in the earnest reader of the author's deep earnestness, and never carrying him far away from the spiritual depths and heights of eternal life.

Out of what seems to some a chaos as confused as Heuschrecke's Paper Bags (though I cannot confess to such sense of confusion myself, but have heard of it with my ears), Carlyle evolves, though not in formal order, (1) a record of his own spiritual history, identified with that of mankind, and (2) a philosophy of spiritual religion founded on Kant and Goethe—the Philosophy of Clothes.

1. I judge this book to be the spiritual autobiography of Thomas Carlyle, but with scarcely a fact in it that can be pinned down and counted upon as the record of the actual history of the career of the author. The records are of states of mind and reaches of spiritual experience. Through Teufelsdröckh we learn that Carlyle gazed out of some high window over the crowded dwellings of many people, and meditated on the widely-differing experiences which separated those who physically had but a wall between them, and of the underlying unity beneath this breadth of difference—a meditation kindly sympathetic, withdrawn from actual participation in the outward events of their lives, but touched with their infirmities and tender towards their strivings. But there are millions of upper windows in the world's cities and more than millions in the Anywhere and Everywhere of Imagination. There are streams, too, flowing near every village in the world, and though 'tis pleasant to think of the stream of Carlyle's contemplation by the side of the brook which at Ecclefechan runs beside the house in which he was born, and to picture him sitting on a wall hard by and gazing towards the sunset, yet in his story he gives us no detail that can be taken as a record of fact. Imaginative love of Nature, childhood delights which recall the delights of all sweet, natural, country-fed childhood, the wonder of opening intelligence, the advance into responsible manhood, all are records of experience; but so told that the circumstances are but symbols and scenery for the soul's history, and that which is the story of Thomas Carlyle is found, at least in parts, to be equally the story of our own lives; for we, too, are immortal souls in mortal bodies living in a world of men and women and things such as he pictures, and the essentials of soul-striving and heart-yearning are ours as well as his. Charming is the brief reference to childhood memories; wise is the view of education as a life process of which school books and professed teachers are but a little part. Then in the difficulty of "getting under way" we find the burden which oppresses so many of us in this generation, of fitting our immortal longings and principles into the commonplace actualities of unromantic professional and trading occupations, which seem almost entirely taken up with the material life and specially designed to force all spiritual things and thoughts and emotions out of the business of these few short earthly years. In that sphere, too, wherein even the time-bound traders and bread-winners imagine there shall be peace and love and everlasting blessedness, a refuge from paltry struggles and small ideas, from competitions of money and of ungenerous use of skill, Teufelsdröckh finds, as we, too, often find, that it is not allowed to fence off one piece of our earthly existence and keep that pure and sacred while the rest is all intentionally chaotic and harsh. The home-centred love cannot be widely nurtured in a land whose dealings outside the home are loveless, and the merchant's methods find their way into the relation of the sexes. Wherefore Blumine is not for Teufelsdröckh. We, too, whether we gain our Blumine or not, and our Blumines too, whether they be allied to the hero or money-winner of their choice or miss him, shall inevitably find that all the worldliness and meanness and hardness we permit ourselves in the outside world, will thrust its dividing and dissolving poison into the relations of our own homes, and that there is no magic charm whereby we can encircle the domestic section of our soul and keep it pure while that which is turned towards humanity is allowed to be foul. Alas! our Blumines, as well as their lovers, are too often trained to mercenary living; and the Teufelsdröckhs, of whom there is one somewhere in each of us, go wandering homeless through the land. There is no true and lasting love of man for woman and woman for man that does not live in mutual bearing of the world's burdens and mutual seeking for God's guidance. All else in the relations of married life, if not thus inspired, is of time, and with time will pass away. Thus is it better that Teufelsdröckh should wander uncomfited than that he should be comforted with a toy or a sweetmeat.

Forlorn and lonely did Teufelsdröckh, and Thomas Carlyle, and each of us who has faced the realities of existence honestly for himself, wander through earth and sky; and he saw strange cities and many people; and sometimes Nature soothed him; and ever was there the bond of silent sympathy with the needs and labours and sorrows of mankind, and a far off yearning towards their joys. The world-sorrow mingled with his personal disappointments and perplexities; but he kept his troubles to himself and wandered as a spectator who, apart from the throng, philosophises silently to himself on destiny as seen in others and perplexingly felt in himself. Morbid feelings and deep spiritual yearnings after the infinitely good and great were almost inseparably mingled. Far, far did he wander; but could not escape from his own shadow. In all this wandering he was a son of Time, though his meditations sought Eternity. He had not yet learned the truth, which became one of Carlyle's landmarks—"The end of man is an Action and not a Thought, though it were the noblest." "Aimless discontinuity," "nebulous envelopment," nevertheless "a progressive and growing spiritual nature," are his. Without definite hope or definite fear; yet is divine life working in him; for though the universe should be found to be void of life, of purpose or volition, yet would he have truth at any cost—"Truth though the Heavens crush me for following her: no Falsehood though a whole celestial Lubberland were the price of Apostacy." Though reward and punishment were annulled, or worse, followed on the wrong side, yet was the everlasting law of right and wrong in the heart: they were not the same; but right was ever right and wrong was always wrong. And Destiny could not doom him not to die. Thus in the gloom, fearful, with vague apprehensions, unsatisfied, not understanding either himself or the world, overburdened in thought and feeling, at last, one day, he turns upon his moods and asks: "What art thou afraid of? Death? Though it be Death and all that Devil or man can do against Thee, art not Thou a child of Freedom who can suffer? Let it come: I will meet it and defy it!" With defiance he shook base fear from him. "The everlasting No" had permeated his being, making him feel fatherless, outcast, in a Devil's universe. In native strength he arose and conquered: "I am not thine, but Free, and for ever hate thee."

The pilgrimages continue, but with some incipient purpose in them; and meditations on what may be seen by the wandering imagination, whether in a wandering or stationary body, lead out more into the world, and away from the self-centred burden. Yet is there large measure of indifference. With infinite love and infinite pity he regards his fellow-men, and begins to measure more truly their littleness and their greatness, and to learn that there is a way out of many of life's discontents and troubles and reverses, by reducing demands rather than expecting an ever-increasing supply of wants. By renunciation Life really begins. He has a gospel of action: "Do the duty that lies next." Complain not of circumstance: the ideal is in thyself to shape with it the actual. Live out your best: conditions are the material upon which you have to work. Thus the soul learns its own creative power. "The everlasting no" is denied: "the everlasting yea" is affirmed, and brings light and joy. 'Tis useless to sigh for a perfect workshop and a perfect material with which to work. Here and now is your work, which is to turn the imperfect, chaotic, by laborious activity, somewhat nearer to the ideal and, so far as you can see, perfect kosmos, whose disparity with the present conditions has been the ground of your despair and lamentation. That same disparity is the measure of the deep need for your work, the token which once seen can never more be honestly denied, that there is work for you to do, to which you are called by God,—

"Do not linger in the darkness; God is waiting, friend, for you."

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

LITERATURE.

INTRODUCTION TO THE HERBARTIAN PRINCIPLES OF TEACHING.*

TEACHERS, past, present and future, have to thank Miss Dodd for a valuable and interesting book. Full it is, as an egg, of meat; and, mindful of teachers' scant leisure, moderate in bulk. Very valuable are the mottoes with which each division of the work is enriched; and one saying (p. 9), "to use words without understanding them is an intellectual immorality," is unsurpassed as a maxim of pedagogic ethics.

Chapter I. gives Herbart's noble assertion, "The one supreme aim of education is the development of moral character"; and the great purpose of the book is to show how this aim may be reached, "by instruction which makes for character." Chapter II. on True Interest, as that towards which all instruction should work, is full of wisdom. False "interests" of prizes and penalties are dropped by our author as extinct barbarisms. Would that the fact were so! Surely in another form of words this agrees with Froebel's idea of the teacher's function to find out what the child can do, and set it to do that. It will like to do whatsoever you wish, if the matter is cut fine enough and brought close to the fibres of its intelligence. The "content" of the child's mind, the fruit of "intercourse and experience" (Herbart), the unpurposed education of circumstance and environment (Froebel), is the starting-place. The rules of the road are those familiar maxims: from the Known to the Unknown; from the Easy to the Difficult; from the Concrete to the Abstract; so easy, so far-reaching, and so imperfectly obeyed.

Chapter III. is rich in suggestion and warning; showing the wonderful range of this content, and the need of teaching, for its arrangement—correction—completion. Chapter IV., examining studies with a view to the ethical purpose, puts History as the most important study. But history proper is surely for upgrown students, not for children. Is not history, as conveyed in the usual text-books, full of that "intellectual immorality" which uses words not understood? But story made vivid with objects offered to the faithful eye, illustrated by the pupils' hand-work, can bring elements of virtual, essential history to the mind of children. "Fables"—known to be among the most ancient fossils of literature—should commence what might be called, in Pestalozzian phrase, an A B C of the science of man. "Fairy tales" might succeed; "tales" connected with names of real persons—let us say, legends—should follow; and next true stories of men, women, and events, would form a bridge to the reading of works of the great historians, which is the porch of historical study. Here, truly, we find instruction whose use might "make for character." Each story would be discussed by the class as to its moral truth and worth, and thus help to draw soundly and well each child's ethical "circle of thought."

Chapters IV. and V. contain wealth of material for any one who will use the step-ladder sketched above (or improve it); while in the last three chapters we find "Schemes" worked out with a fulness and delicacy which render them studies of method. The "Armada" is good; "Columbus" still better; "Robinson Crusoe," perhaps, best of all. Through what malign accident the "Choice of Paris" has been introduced among stories designed for children of six—or any—years, we cannot conceive. Moral development being the supreme end of education, we protest solemnly against offering to children any matter, classical or romantic, whose substance under whatever beauty of form outrages the essentials of Christian morals. This does not mean mutilating literature. What children read for themselves does not hurt, but slips aside unfelt; while that which we—parents or teachers—give, or choose for them, is driven home by the weight of our authority.

Chapter VI., on Natural Science Study, though not so rich in help for the teacher who is seeking a more excellent way than rote or cram, as are the chapters on Humanistic Studies, contains bright hints of a "Good time Coming," when school journeys shall form a portion of every scholar's holiday: when Heimat-kunde, that is "home-geography," knowledge of the child's immediate surroundings; of the school-house and ground; our village, the near hill, the river that runs by, shall take place of, or at least precede the topography of Madagascar and Nova Zembla.

"They who are not against us are for us." All who labor for true education—that "for want whereof," as Milton wrote in 1641, "all Britain perisheth"; that "behind which," as Immanuel Kant said, "hides the hope of the perfection of mankind"—are allies. Friedrich Froebel is my master. His motto, "Harmonious development of the gifts which every child of God brings with it into this world," is for me complete and final; not opposed to but embracing Herbart's "supreme aim" of moral development. Words fail to express Herbart's zeal for the true good of man. Believing education to be the best means to this end; as did Froebel, his soul was in education, as truly as was Froebel's. Wherein do they differ? Not in the "good will" of their souls, but in the forms of their thought, through which this enthusiasm of humanity works in the world of real life. I will touch slightly upon three points, wherein the Herbartian theory seems to me erroneous or defective.

To Froebel, children are "plants which my Heavenly Father hath planted"—infinitely more varied in their qualities than the subjects of the Vegetable Kingdom! The true teacher sees to it that all plants have what all plants need, then lets all grow in their own way with as little interference as may be; but—nachgehend—following humbly, he observes with reverence how individuals differ in disposition, or faculty, and gives to each the help needed by its peculiar nature. Herbart (p. 18) says: "The mind has no innate natural talents or faculties whatever." His teacher, by processes which irreverently described, resemble the putting of valuable matters into a casket, or arranging specimens in a cabinet, is to "form the mind." Herbart (u.s.) considers ideas and shows how they make the mind. Were this working hypothesis correct, might we not expect all these similar subjects, similarly treated, to come out identical? But they come out endlessly diverse. Next I miss, in the Herbartians, distinct recognition of a truth most earnestly asserted by Froebel: that bodily work—productive labour—is essential to complete unfolding of the human being. Our book shows that the Herbartians have learned, whether from practice or from Froebel, the worth of his most pregnant motto: "Learn by doing." They set their pupil to work—to see with eyes and make with hand, concrete forms or signs of the abstract thoughts they are aiming to reach, and find its ideas hereby cleared and widened. But preparation for life in this workaday world—helps to learn the duty and dignity of toil—so vividly presented by Froebel, seem absent from Herbart's purview.

Were I set to put into one sentence the most momentous truth about education, learnt from children during fifty or sixty years of practice, my reply would be: "Children educate one another." Beyond all other means or appliances for the attainment of the most momentous ends—for character—"common" education is the one specific. A benevolent up-grown despotism to "see fair"—to keep order—and the like, may be assumed; although children left too much to themselves often come out better than those too much "managed," whether harshly or indulgently. This fundamental truth I find conspicuously absent from the system of Herbart, who, without children of his own, and never having taught a class, lacked that rough and ready everyday experience, for the want of which, perhaps, the deepest and most far-fetched philosophy cannot wholly compensate.

As an inveterate humorist, I humbly offer two small comparisons of, or for, the Herbartian "movement in education." It reminds me, first, with its "big words" of "apperception," "concentration," "method-wholes," and "culture-periods" of the Ptolomean Astronomy with its cycles and epicycles, beside the simplicity of Newton.

"All the rhetorician's rules Are little but to name his tools," says (Hudibras) Butler. Yet more do

* "Introduction to the Herbartian Principles of Teaching." By Catherine J. Dodd, Day Training Department, The Owens College, Manchester. Sonnenschein and Co. 4s. 6d.

the Herbartians remind me of the Neo-Platonists of the second and third centuries, who, when Christianity to the "superior" eye had begun to grow at once worldly and vulgar (if the words are not synonymous!), endeavoured to patch up a religion out of the tatters and patches of the old, and show it to be better than the New. We that have spent our lives in training children, and lack not an Apostolic readiness to "magnify our office," shiver at the very thought of engaging to "form the child's mind," or "constructing Its circle of thought," or make Its character. We use every means, neglect no precaution, think nothing unimportant that affects the child—corporeally, mentally, spiritually—and pray we may do no harm; but having done our best, we will not take blame, or claim merit, whether our pupil turn out a Seneca or a Nero.

Could I venture to hope for any influence on my fellow disciples of Froebel, I should earnestly commend to their study this little work, because it shows so well how a genuine intellectual and moral training may proceed upon lines different from ours. Were there any chance of my being listened to by Herbartians, I should exhort them to study Froebel.

WILLIAM H. HERFORD.

IS NATURE CRUEL.*

MR. CROWTHER HIRST has collected together from public sources and private letters a number of expressions of personal experience from persons who have been attacked by wild beasts, and who undoubtedly would have suffered no more if they had actually been killed. Almost all of these confirm Livingstone in his opinion that death by the claws and fangs of a wild beast is almost painless. Two speak of great pain, but it is momentary "intense pain and then—blank." "I certainly felt the most awful pain I have ever experienced while she [the tiger] was biting my neck, but not afterwards, so far as I can remember." Captain Noyes, who was knocked down by a lion and had his hand bitten in two places, was not conscious of any pain whatever, but "felt just as if I had been bowled over in a football match and nothing more."

William Judge, a trainer in a wild beast show, who was fearfully mauled by a lion, says he felt no pain "at the time"—that is to say, he would have felt none at all if he had really been killed outright. All the pain came afterwards; and he adds the quaint explanation: "The doctors said it hurt so much that I could not feel the pain then."

Mr. Baker and Mr. Heath, superintendents of police in India, give several instances of natives badly wounded by wild beasts who apparently suffered no pain at all at the time.

Mr. Hirst argues that it is not reasonable to suppose that a mouse killed by a cat, a bird killed by a hawk, a seal killed by a bear, or any other animal slain and eaten in the great struggle for existence, suffers more than a man killed by a lion; and that the pain in Nature caused by the struggle for existence is very slight.

There are usually two fallacies in the estimation of the amount of pain that any creature, whether man or wild animal, suffers in given circumstances. First of all we are liable to think of the pain as increased in proportion to the amount of force used in producing it. The pain caused by the stroke of a lion's paw is thought of as immensely greater than that which is given by the scratch of a cat. The shock of any kind that kills is imagined to be painful in proportion to its violence. Happily, however, the violence that we expect to produce pain does, as a matter of fact, produce unconsciousness. The man who is stunned by a blow feels nothing, and the sense of horror or great excitement of any kind annuls the physical senses even if it does not produce actual unconsciousness.

There is a curious phenomenon among some of the lower animals, usually spoken of as pretending death in order to escape from their enemies. Many kinds of beetles and small animals if touched become quite still and rigid as if dead. It is scarcely possible to suppose that they are conscious, but by an act of will maintain this death-like appearance. They are, doubtless, unconscious at the time, and if devoured in that state have absolutely no sensation. It is reasonable to suppose that to a considerable extent the senses are numbed in all cases, even of the higher animals.

Another fallacy arises from the supposition that all the present and after effects of pain must be worse for the sufferer than for the spectator. In some respects the very reverse of this is true. In all cases of violent injury or wounds, the impression on the mind of the spectator is more painful and lasting than on the sufferers. Everyone must have had opportunities of noticing how a schoolboy of very ordinary courage and patience will joke about his wounds, at the time when his mother or sisters are in actual suffering at the sight of them.

Of course it is possible for persons to become accustomed and, therefore, comparatively indifferent to anything, and surgeons and nurses happily are not permanently troubled in mind by all the wounds they see; but take two persons equally unaccustomed to such things, one of whom has his leg taken off and the other of whom stands by and sees it done, and in after years it will be found that it is the spectator who has the most vivid and painful recollection of the operation.

Wild animals have none of these feelings. When a single individual is struck down by a beast of prey or snapped up by a bird, probably no other animal is conscious of its fate. When a hawk swoops down on a flock of small birds and strikes one of them, the rest do not stop to see it being eaten and mourn its fate, and fear that their own turn will come, and flit about for the rest of their lives with a sad memory in their hearts and a daily fear for their own safety. They do not even see what actually happens; they are away and out of sight in a moment, just as much frightened as if a passer-by had clapped his hands at them, and no more.

In considering the animal world we must always beware of crediting the inferior animals with the sensations that we should have, or think we should have, in similar circumstances. Some few of the domestic animals share, no doubt, in the more distinctly human feelings. The horse and the dog more especially we have to some extent humanised. We have made them our companions, and we are bound to treat them as such. Nor is anything to be said in defence of cruelty which we inflict on any of the wild dumb animals. But they have a kingdom and a law of their own. Its ideals are strength, and skill, and beauty, and these win in the struggle, just as surely as justice and love win ultimately among men. Love, indeed, has its place among them also.

Granted that a world which lives by movement and change and the alternations of birth and growth and decay and death is not in itself an evil, it is difficult to imagine one that should have a larger proportion of life and vigour and happiness, and a smaller proportion of pain than this one of ours has in what we call its lower strata of existence. The insect that floats about in the sunshine till it is snapped up by a bird, if such an organism can be said to be capable of happiness, has had a perfectly happy life, absolutely free from all suffering or pain, and certainly in its instantaneous death cannot feel as much pain as a man feels when he pinches his finger. And in the higher ranks of purely animal life, each individual has for the most part from its birth to its death one long succession of gratified desires or successful exertions, until at the last it is struck by a sudden blow of its captor, or creeps numb and almost unconscious to some hiding-place to die.

Mr. Hirst's little book is a sound contribution to the problem of suffering in Nature as apart from those sufferings which are peculiar to man, or the pain that man deliberately inflicts on his fellow-creatures, whether of his own race or of the races of animals that are subject to him. It does not pretend to solve what is called the problem of evil, even in regard to the existence of physical pain alone, but it affords those who love Nature, and are in close sympathy with all the joy and beauty of her life, a sound argument in her defence against those who ignorantly defame her.

OBITUARY.

THE MAYOR OF BATH.

THE citizens of Bath are called upon to mourn the loss of their Chief Magistrate, and the congregation of the Trim-street Chapel, a life-long member and a very faithful friend. Alderman John Ricketts died on Thursday evening, July 13. From the time of his election as Mayor, in November last, his health had been failing, but with quiet persistence and unfailing courage he fought against the encroaching disease, fulfilling all the duties of his office so long as strength remained, and to the last caring for the interests of the city. Only a month before the end, he held a civic reception, and two days before he died was earnestly discussing business with some of his oldest friends. His parting was without pain and in perfect peace.

John Ricketts was a native of Bath, having been born there Dec. 5, 1837, and the whole of his active life was spent in the city. On leaving school he was articled to the late Mr. R. H. Hellings, and was admitted as a solicitor at the age of twenty-two. Always an earnest politician, he was for twenty years Agent of the Liberal party, and was one of the original members of the National Liberal Club. In 1874 he entered the City Council, and served for various terms, becoming Chairman of the Surveying Committee, and in 1897 an Alderman. By his wide and intimate knowledge of municipal law, his great practical abilities and grasp of finance, he rendered distinguished services to the city. Inspired by an address which he heard from Richard Cobden nearly fifty years ago, Mr. Ricketts, in 1870, with two other friends, founded the Bath Liberal Building Society. The great prosperity of this society was largely due to his capable management as solicitor, and the gratitude of the members was expressed last March by a presentation at the twenty-ninth annual meeting. Mr. Ricketts was for many years a Freemason, and held high office in the Society.

Following in his father's steps, he was throughout his life a member of the congregation of the Trim-street Chapel, of which he was a trustee. For many years he served as secretary to the congregation, and it had been one of his cherished hopes, which death has now prevented, to invite the members of the Corporation to accompany him in civic state to his own place of worship.

Sympathetic reference to the Mayor's death was made last Sunday in churches and chapels throughout the city. The rector of Bath, preaching in the Abbey Church, paid a warm tribute to the courage and persistency with which the deceased had to the last given himself to the duties of his office, and expressed the conviction that he would hear the "Well done" for services faithfully performed and faithfully finished.

At Trim-street Chapel the Rev. F. W. Stanley preached from 2 Cor. iv. 18, and in the course of his sermon made the following allusions:—

"We have lost from our own congregation during the past week one who for a lifetime has worshipped within these walls, one who has given without stint the energy at his command for the well-being of this city. Suffering and weakness, borne with a fortitude seldom seen, have ended at last in the calm of death. And sorrowful hearts are left to marvel that the manly strength, so lately exercised, should now be gone. . . . Happily after death it is the custom of our nation to try generously to realise how much they owe to the departed, and how strenuously the hands now quietly folded once battled in the fray. We know with how persistent a determination, and with how much ability John Ricketts worked. The force he put into things which he thought necessary and right, is a matter of common notoriety. There are men before the public whose aloofness renders them but poor helpers of such as most need them. Let it be remembered that all might approach him and try to secure his championship. Long will the city look before it finds another to fill his place. But overshadowing the recollection of tasks that had become habitual, is the thought of the office he held. During nearly three centuries, only twice before, if I mistake not, has death summoned a Mayor of Bath in the period of his rule. How ill do death and the symbols of power accord! Never is our mortality brought more forcibly home to us than when all the pomp of our civic and national life surround the dead. The panoply of state seems to encompass a shadow. The strength behind the things visible, and which gave them reality, is struck down. What can appear enduring? Authority and control are brought low, as the breath of the angel of darkness falls. And yet those symbols, dishonoured and valueless though they seem, represent a sway mightier than that of death. They tell of justice and right, thank God! in England. They are not emblems of the rule of the flesh—but they declare that though men arise and pass away, the fast resolves of God are unchangeable."

The funeral took place on Monday afternoon, and was of a public character. At the Guildhall the cortège of private mourners was joined by members of the Corporation and other public bodies, and proceeded to the Abbey Church, where a memorial service was held. At the Locksbrook Cemetery a further service was held, conducted by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, who delivered a short address. Among the floral tributes was one from the Corporation, which during the service in the Abbey Church was hung over the Mayor's chair—a magnificent wreath or chaplet, composed of honesty and marguerite daisies, with the symbolic interpretation, "Honest as the day."

God does not send us strange flowers every year,

When the spring winds blow o'er the pleasant places,

The same dear things lift up the same fair faces,

The violet is here.

It all comes back, the odour, grace; and hue;

Each sweet relation of its life repeated, No blank is left—no looking-for is cheated,

It is the thing we knew.

So after the death—winter, it must be—God will not put strange signs in heavenly places;

The old love shall look out from the old faces,

I shall have thee.—Selects I.

THE INWARD LIFE.

HE that has an eye and a heart can even now say: Why should I falter? Light has come into the world; to such as love Light, so as Light must be loved, with a boundless all-doing, all-enduring love. For the rest, let that vain struggle to read the mystery of the Infinite cease to harass us. It is a mystery which, through all ages, we shall only read here a line of, there another line of. Do we not already know that the name of the Infinite is Good, is God? Here on earth we are as Soldiers, fighting in a foreign land; that understand not the plan of the campaign, and have no need to understand it; seeing well what is at our hand to be done. Let us do like Soldiers; with submission, with courage, with a heroic joy. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might." Behind us, behind each one of us, lie Six Thousand Years of human effort, human conquest: before us is the boundless Time, with its as yet uncreated and unconquered Continents and Eldorados, which we, even we, have to conquer, to create; and from the bosom of Eternity there shine for us celestial guiding stars.—Carlyle's Essay on "Characteristics," 1831.

Our Life is compassed round with Necessity; yet is the meaning of Life itself no other than Freedom, than Voluntary Force; thus have we a warfare; in the beginning, especially, a hard-fought battle. For the God-given mandate, Work thou in Well-doing, lies mysteriously written, in Promethean, Prophetic characters, in our hearts; and leaves us no rest, night or day, till it be deciphered and obeyed; till it burn forth, in our conduct, a visible, acted Gospel of Freedom.

Fore-shadows, call them rather fore-splendours, of that Truth, and Beginning of Truths, fell mysteriously over my soul. Sweeter than Dayspring to the Shipwrecked in Nova Zembla; oh! like the mother's voice to her little child that strays bewildered weeping, in unknown tumults; like soft streamings of celestial music to my too exasperated heart, came that Evangel. The Universe is not dead and demoniacal, a charnel-house with spectres; but God-like, and my Father's!

There is in man a Higher than Love of Happiness: he can do without Happiness, and instead thereof find Blessedness! Was it not to preach forth this same Higher than sages and martyrs, Poet and the Priest, in all times have spoken and suffered; bearing testimony, through life and through death, of the God-like that is in Man, and how in the God-like only has he Strength and Freedom? Which God-inspired Doctrine art thou also honoured to be taught; O Heavens! and broken with manifold merciful Afflictions, ever till thou become contrite, and learn it! O thank thy Destiny for these; thankfully bear what yet remain; thou hadst need of them; the Self in thee needed to be annihilated. By benignant fever-paroxysms is Life rooting out the deep-seated chronic Disease, and triumphs over Death. On the roaring billows of Time, thou art not engulfed, but borne aloft into the azure of Eternity. Love not Pleasure; love God. This is the EVERLASTING YEA, wherein all contradiction is solved; wherein whoso walks and works, it is well with him.

Conviction, were it never so excellent, is worthless till it convert itself into Conduct. Nay, properly Conviction is not possible till then; inasmuch as all Speculation is by nature endless, formless, a vortex amid vortices: only by a felt indubitable certainty of Experience does it find any centre to revolve round, and so fashion itself into a system. Most true is it, as a wise man teaches us, that "Doubt of any sort cannot be removed except by Action." On which ground, too, let him who gropes painfully in darkness or uncertain light, and prays vehemently that the dawn may ripen into day, lay this other precept well to heart, which to me was of invaluable service: "Do the Duty which lies nearest thee," which thou knowest to be a Duty! Thy second Duty will already have become clearer.

The Situation that has not its Duty, its Ideal, was never yet occupied by men. Yes here, in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable Actual, wherein thou even now standest, here or nowhere is thy Ideal: work it out therefrom; and working, believe, live, be free. Fool! the Ideal is in thyself, the Impediment, too, is in thyself: thy Condition is but the stuff thou art to shape that same Ideal out of: what matters whether such stuff be of this sort or that, so the Form thou give it be heroic, be poetic? O thou that pinest in the imprisonment of the Actual, and criest bitterly to the gods for a kingdom wherein to rule and create, know this of a truth: the thing thou seekest is already with thee, "here or nowhere," couldst thou only see!

Produce! Produce! Were it but the pitifulest infinitesimal fraction of a Product, produce it in God's name! 'Tis the utmost thou hast in thee; out with it then. Up, up! Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy whole might. Work while it is called To-day, for the Night cometh wherein no man can work.—Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus," 1833-4.

ELDER SCHOLARS, A CORRECTION.

SIR,—Unfortunately I did not see your issue of July 8 in time to ask the favour of your immediate correction of an error concerning the real drift of my remarks at the recent Teachers' Conference at Oxford.

I am represented as saying that our efforts at retaining our young people were disappointing, and as I am mentioned as coming from Bristol, many of your readers would naturally regard my words as reflecting on our work there. But my sole purpose was to encourage my fellow-teachers by the assurance that although we in common with other places had in times past suffered from this leakage, we seemed at Lewins Mead to be actually solving this very serious question. Throughout last winter the efforts of our minister have been persistently and successfully addressed to the young people amongst us, to our elder scholars and our teachers, with the result that at the present time the evening congregations are very largely comprised of such, and it was largely for the purpose of considering the plans we had adopted under Mr. Blatchford's guidance and others that were suggested that led to a second conference on the subject.

Thanking you for the opportunity of making this correction in justice to our teachers and our minister.

MUSIC IN OUR CHURCHES.

SIR,—The study of some anthems of comparatively simple structure would be a great gain to our country choirs. Permit me through your columns to ask for suggestions. As an example, there is a very fine anthem by T. P. Ryder, a celebrated Boston (U.S.) organist. It is entitled "Hear my Prayer." This lovely composition is easily learned, and the fact that it has an andante movement tells in favour of its study by country and mission choirs.

After the first few bars, the words which follow are those of the well-known hymn "Rock of Ages." A slight paraphrase of this hymn would, doubtless, meet the requirements of our churches in the matter.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THERE is in our house a photograph from a picture by Fra Angelico, in which he shows a lovely peaceful place with grass and flowers, where angels welcome into heaven the mortals who come from earth. Every mortal who comes is welcomed by an angel, who receives him when he arrives. There are many mortals arriving, and all are embraced and led away to where they join a circle, hand in hand, with an angel and a mortal alternately. As I looked at this picture I thought of the words, "There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth"; for though I do not know that those people were specially sinners, the whole picture made one feel peace and joy—"Joy in heaven."

Can mortals, then, give joy to those in heaven?

Is not heaven quite happy, and can we make any difference?

Whom do we think of as in heaven? Is it not our dear ones who have died?

One has parted with his mother. When she was with him, was not her one desire and hope for him that he should be good? Was she not grieved when he did wrong, and glad and thankful when he did right? And the love and longing in her heart for him did not change when she went to heaven. Would it make no difference to her, as she watched her child from heaven, whether he were good or bad? Would not even heaven seem sad to her if he were wicked—if he were a "sinner"—as earth was dark and sad to her when he sinned when she was on earth? If he realised that he made even heaven sad to her by his sin, he could surely never sin again.

But if he does sin, and if he repents, Jesus says that then there is joy in heaven; the sorrow is turned into joy. And the sorrow and joy are not only with the mother or father, sister or brother, or friend who is gone to heaven. There is the "Father in heaven" who, because He loves His children, shares the sorrow or the joy, according as they are sinful or good. And if they repent!—why, there is joy in heaven because His child returns to the loving God who is all goodness.

And what does it mean—"to repent"? It does not mean only to feel rather sorry for what we have done, and to wish we had not done it. It means to feel so sorry that we long to make amends for our wrong-doing. We cannot undo it—that can never be; but we will try with all our might to prevent the harm that it will do. The prodigal son in the story said: "I will go to my father and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee." But that was not all he said; he goes on, "And am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me one of thy hired servants." That is true repentance, when we are anxious not only to do something so difficult as to own that we did wrong, but also to beg to be taken back on any terms however humble. And as in the parable the father was so glad, so the Father in heaven must be glad, and there is joy in heaven over the sinner that repenteth. Is it not wonderful to think that our little doings here must make a difference to those who are in heaven, and to God Himself?

There was a family who used every Sunday evening to gather round the piano: father, mother, and children all joined in singing hymns—one of them playing the piano for them all to sing to. The children used to ask for the hymns that were their special favourites. One little boy was there, with sunny face and curly golden hair. He used to ask for the hymn, "There was joy in heaven!" Do you know it? If not, you can find it in "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home." That was his favourite. It was soon his turn to go there, and to find the Joy in heaven which he loved to think of when he was on earth. Did he, too, learn that—

"There is joy in heaven!

There is joy in heaven,

When the sheep that went astray

Turns again to virtue's way;

When the soul, by grace subdued,

Sobs its prayer of gratitude

Then is there joy in heaven!"

When the glowing evening sun shines into the room where that picture hangs, and lights up the lovely angels and seems to make them smile as each one receives the mortal as he "lands alone upon that shore," I remember that little boy, and think of the "Joy in heaven."

AS ANOTHER SEES US.

Our attention has been called to two articles on "Unitarianism," by the Ven. J. W. DIGGLE, Archdeacon of Westmorland, in the April and May numbers of The Churchman, a monthly magazine edited by the Archdeacon of LONDON. Mr. DIGGLE, who was formerly vicar of Mossley Hill, Liverpool, enjoyed, while in that city, the friendship of many Unitarians, and was honoured among them for the breadth of his sympathies and his interest in good works of various kinds. He speaks, therefore, with some personal knowledge of the people with whose religious beliefs he undertakes to deal, both in the way of description and of criticism, and we find in his articles, what indeed we fully expected, a serious, liberal-minded, and sympathetic tone, while, at the same time, there is much, both in the description and the criticism, the justice of which we find it impossible to admit.

But before referring any further to the main subject of these articles we must enter an emphatic protest against Mr. DIGGLE's reference to the Socinians. Modern Unitarians he rightly distinguishes from Socinians; but when he charges these latter with systematic disingenuousness and unworthy subterfuge in the doctrinal language they employ and in their use of the Bible, surely he is speaking at second hand, and adopting without examination the opinion of prejudiced ecclesiastical historians. Of both LÆLIUS and FAUSTUS SOCINUS we have received a very different impression from the masterly sketches of their life and teaching, based upon first-hand knowledge of the sources, contributed by the Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON in 1879 to the last volume of the Theological Review. Of any one who pays serious attention to Mr. DIGGLE's articles we have the right to ask that he will also read Mr. GORDON's two articles on "The Sozzini and their School."

We have been much interested in Mr. DIGGLE's attempt to describe Unitarianism. The term, he says, as indicating doctrine, is vague and wide, "ranging from simple Deism to approximate Trinitarianism." "Unitarianism is a temper, not a creed; a leaven, not a Church; a subjective rather than an objective faith; more a system of negations than of positive beliefs." But, having said so much, Mr. DIGGLE proceeds to make some very definite statements as to what Unitarians do and do not believe. All Unitarians, we are told, disbelieve in the Catholic and Apostolic doctrine of the unity of God.

What Unitarians believe in is not the unity—for unity implies undivided plurality—but the single absolute oneness, the uni-personality, of God. The orthodox faith is that the Godhead is a Unity; Unitarians believe that God is a Unit.

What a unity of "undivided plurality" in God may be we do not pretend to understand, nor do we find in that revelation, to which Mr. DIGGLE would have us submit, any reference to it; but when we are told that we believe in God as a "Unit," we reply with all respect that our critic is playing with words. We do not so think of the Infinite and Eternal, neither do we commit the folly of supposing that we can comprehend the One, who comprehends all that is, but is comprehended of none. But we have learnt with Jesus to trust in God, and to love Him as our Father in heaven. The doctrine of the Lord's Prayer, which was sufficient for the MASTER's life and death, we think should be sufficient for our needs, and for several generations, in lowly discipleship and earnest service, our people have found it so. We are not anxious to engage in further speculations regarding God, which, as Mr. DIGGLE himself says (with the point of the reproach turned against us), "when not rooted in spiritual experience are necessarily unfruitful."

The grounds of our objection to the doctrine of the Trinity are not correctly stated. It is not true that we refuse to bow before mystery and adore the Unsearchable. The revelation of God is that in which we desire absolutely to rest; but it must be actual, spiritual revelation, and not the report of what finds no answering witness of the Spirit within. Humbly to bow before the mystery of the Eternal is something very different from accepting on outward authority propositions concerning God which are self-contradictory.

We are further told that "Each Unitarian congregation is strictly a vague concourse of individuals bound together against orthodoxy by an indeterminate number of negations, but bound together amongst themselves by—nothing." We will not reply, "An enemy hath said this," we will simply set over against such a statement a different view from within the fellowship of those congregations. Mr. DIGGLE has very fairly described the Unitarian's dislike of dogmatism, and is aware of the unwillingness of many Unitarians to form themselves into a separate "Unitarian Church"; but he does not sufficiently realise what the religious life of those congregations which are now popularly known as Unitarian, has been and is. Many of them were once Trinitarian in the form of their belief where now they are Unitarian; and yet from generation to generation there has been a continuous religious life of sincere worship and seeking for the light. The fundamental principle of freedom, untrammelled by dogmatic fetters, has made this possible, and preserves for them the open future. To say that beyond their repulsion from the dogmatism of orthodoxy "nothing" unites the members of such congregations, is to deny their trust in God and the reality of their worship. The fact, however, is that union for the great end of spiritual worship has proved to be a surer bond than any attempt at dogmatic uniformity; and such Free Churches as are true to their ideal live in the strength and the joy of surrender to the living God.

Mr. DIGGLE makes generous acknowledgment of the services rendered by Unitarians in their devotion to intellectual progress and their ethical enthusiasm, and notes also the spiritual advance marked by the teaching of CHANNING, THOM, and MARTINEAU. His conclusions are summed up in the following passage:—

In the past, Unitarianism has done glorious service to the Church in claiming for reason an honoured place in religion; it remains for the Church in the future to show Unitarianism that the sweetest of all forms of reasonableness is an intelligent reverence for Revelation. Unitarianism has also done grand service to the Church in emphasising and bringing into prominence the humanitarian aspects and duties of Christianity; the great importance of righteousness in religion, of the claims of personal liberty as a moderating influence upon central authority, of the rights of conscience to be heard in the discussion of creeds, of the necessity of morals to the life of faith. It now remains for the Church to extend among Unitarians the primary claims of Godwardness in religion, to show that true Christian morals begin with duties to God, that the best way to serve man is first to serve God, that holiness is the highest form of righteousness, that he worketh best who prayeth best, that they who most love God also most love man, that where the spirit of God is, there, and there only, is perfect liberty, and that all true dogmas, even the dogma of the Blessed Trinity, when vitally incorporated into human consciousness, are not mere functionless opinions, but the most effectual of all instruments for exalting and redeeming and hallowing humanity.

As to this, we do not think it can be now justly charged against Unitarians that they are unwilling to learn from "the Church," or from any other religious teachers, in whom they recognise the tones of sincere spiritual conviction. Elements of spiritual truth have been incorporated, we doubt not, even in "the dogma of the Blessed Trinity," though the outcome may prove to be very different from what Orthodoxy now contemplates. We make no claim to be the only people, but desire to be counted among the earnest seekers of the truth. That our devotion is not as ardent as it might be we are quite ready to admit, but we do not think that Mr. DIGGLE does justice to the "Godwardness" of our religious life, nor to the inwardness of our ethical ideal. What he says of Unitarian morality made us think of another famous Archdeacon of his own Church rather than any of our teachers. We certainly should expect to find far more adherents of a utilitarian theory of morals within the Establishment than among present-day Unitarians. It is true that we find our immediate duties in the midst of human life, but their deepest significance is in the Divine intention moving in them all; for not one of them but looks Godward and is consecrated as our FATHER'S will. From Mr. DIGGLE we should go back to COLERIDGE, assured that "he prayeth best who loveth best," and that there is no rightful separation between love and duty, both to God and man.

Having noted the spiritual progress of the present century in the line of our teachers, from PRIESTLEY'S "Institutes" to MARTINEAU'S "Endeavours," Mr. DIGGLE, looking forward another hundred years, expects that if our progress is maintained, and "if also during the same period the Church continues in her present pursuit of sound learning and spiritual enlightenment," Unitarianism, except in the breasts of isolated individuals, will have ceased to exist. What may have happened by the end of the next century to "Unitarianism," and to the creeds of the Church and the Act of Uniformity, we are not anxious at present to inquire. But our faith is that the life of those Free Churches, which are now the spiritual home of Unitarians, will be still maintained, only in the fellowship of a far greater company, under whatever name, with a richer measure of devotion and of beneficent activity in the world. And we may hope that the Church of England also, born into a new freedom, may be of that company, living in the strength of the SPIRIT, not under sacerdotal rule, and that, in a truer sense than ever before, the religious life of this nation may be gathered into one spiritual communion, and may avail to make of this kingdom the Kingdom of our God.

THE PULPIT.

THE CHURCH AND NONCONFORMITY.*

BY THE REV. H. SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.

Hearken unto me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord: look unto the rock whence ye were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye were digged.—Isaiah li. 1.

No one can complain of lack of interest in religion at the present day, but we have often reason to complain of lack of understanding. To understand the present situation, we should know how it has grown out of the past. The history of religion in England ought to be known, it is so interesting and instructive, so deeply interwoven with our literature and our politics, that is, with the nation's life of thought and life of action which have made us what we are. This history ought to be learned in our schools, and studied in our colleges. What there is in it doubtful or obscure ought to be investigated by learned and impartial scholars. The broad facts about which no reasonable doubt exists ought to form part of the common heritage of knowledge among the people. If this were so, when questions of disputed politics arise, as now in connection with the rating of tithe, or about ritualism or disestablishment or religious teaching in Day-schools, then, in meeting these difficulties, we should proceed on a basis of sound and widespread knowledge.

There is another question of still more personal interest to those whom I am now addressing, a question that you have to settle for yourselves and your children, and that is, whether you will belong to the Church of England as by law established, or whether you will belong to the Nonconformity which in so many instances was founded by your actual forefathers: and this you cannot rightly judge without knowing the history of religion in this land of ours. Our Nonconformist ancestors made great sacrifices for their faith. We, who inherit their chapels and their traditions; we, who are their spiritual descendants, and in many cases are flesh of their flesh and bone of their bone, we ought at least to understand intelligently why they made these sacrifices, and whether the struggle in which they were engaged is really over and the victory won, or whether the fight still continues, and there is the same need as ever for faithful service in the field, and still the call for sacrifice. This last is a point of extreme importance for many of us to-day. Some seem to doubt whether there is anything left worth struggling for. There has been so much softening down of the old hard dogmas. There is now so little preaching of hell-fire. The doctrines of the Trinity and of the Atonement are now set forth in such different terms from what was common formerly. There is so much shaking of hands over the old division walls—that many are inclined to doubt whether any divisions are worth keeping up, at any rate at the cost of much self-sacrifice; if it is not best to go with the great majority, probably to join the Church of England with all its enormous advantages, pecuniary, fashionable—yes, and also devotional and spiritual; many ask if the time is not come to cease caring for the flag which once rallied so many brave lovers of truth and freedom. Before deciding this question we ought to know the history of our national religion.

For my own part, I am grateful to the Evangelical Free Church Councils for so rigorously excluding us from their fellowship. We do not hold their Creed, and could not unite with them on a theological basis without playing fast and loose with the plain meaning of words. Once there was little difference between English Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists; we ought to know the history and the meaning of the difference which now cuts us off from their communion.

It is, then, for this knowledge that I plead to-day. We cannot afford time to dwell now on the earlier portion of this history. Let us come at once to the question of most vital interest to us—What was the Reformation in England? Of course, in its larger aspect, the Reformation sprang from the Revival of Learning, and was part of that new birth through which modern culture and civilisation have emerged from mediævalism. But how did this Reformation specially affect England? We do not always remember that the first Article in Magna Charta secures the Church of England in its ancient rights and privileges. In time of King John, the Church existed in England as a supreme self-governing power, alongside of the State, acknowledging the Headship of the Pope at Rome, but accepting the final authority only of a General Council, composed of all Christian bishops. A General Council was fully competent to depose a Pope. This was the Holy Catholic Church of the Middle Ages. What brought about the Reformation in England? It came about because King Henry VIII. wished to divorce his wife, and could not get the dispensation he required from the Pope. There was no doctrinal change during his reign. The dissolution of the Monastic houses and the translation of the Bible into English were accomplished; but beyond this nothing was done save the change of headship from the Pope to the King. But that change practically meant the entire abolition of the ancient rights and privileges of the Church in England secured by Magna Charta. Henceforth it is a question of the personal religion of the English Sovereign, with the acquiescence of the servile Parliaments which registered the will of those imperious Tudors. Under Edward VI. the principles of the Reformation, imported from abroad, made great progress in high quarters, without much affecting the beliefs of the bulk of the people. There was popular rejoicing when Queen Mary ascended the throne and restored Catholicism. But the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church. Those burnings alive at Smithfield did what nothing else could have done in the space of four years; and when Elizabeth became Queen, popular rejoicing was still louder over the banishment of the Papal Legate, and all England came together as one man to resist the invasion threatened by the Spanish Armada. Elizabeth, however, was very far from being a thorough Protestant; and the alterations of the Prayer-book settled in her reign left it a poor, half-hearted compromise, less in accord with the new religion than it had been at the close of her brother's reign. She could not do without Protestant support in her struggle with the Pope and Philip of Spain; but she went no farther in this direction than she was obliged, and when the House of Commons passed a Bill carrying a little further forward the principles of the Reformation, she sharply told the members of the House that she, the Queen, was settled in her religion, and would not be disturbed. That was the Reformation in England, essentially political, not a religious movement, just guided and regulated according to the personal predilections of the reigning monarch. Can we wonder that religious reformers were not satisfied with what was done? The conflict was intensified in this way. Those most deeply committed to the principles of the Reformation during the reign of Edward VI. fled beyond the seas when Mary came to the throne. Abroad they sought the society of their co-religionists. Many went to Geneva, where they found Calvin at the zenith of his power. In 1553 he had just burned Michael Servetus. Calvin had done two things for the Reformation: he had systematised its theology, and he had organised its worship and relations with the State. In 1558, when Elizabeth became Queen, these exiles returned to England, having seen at Geneva a working model of what they conceived a Christian State should be; and bitterly were they disappointed with the miserable compromise which was all they could secure from Queen Elizabeth. They had hopes of better things from James I., for he had been brought up under the Presbyterianism established in Scotland by John Knox. But this bringing up had only taught James to dislike Presbyterianism and prefer Episcopacy. "No Bishop, no King," became his motto. He liked the courtly prelates who assured him of his divine right to rule. At length came Civil War; and Puritanism, after suffering 100 years of persecution, rose to power under Cromwell. But Puritanism triumphant did not make itself popular; it was too harsh and gloomy for the national temperament, and Cromwell's death was followed by the great reaction of the Restoration. So we reach 1662, the day of Black Bartholomew, when 2,000 of the noblest clergymen who ever served the Church of England resigned their livings, and made Nonconformity the permanent condition of fully half the English nation.

Do we clearly realise why the 2,000 made so great a sacrifice for truth and righteousness? They would not declare their unfeigned assent and consent to everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer—that compromise of contradictory propositions! They cared too much for truthfulness. Then, many of them had been ordained after the Presbyterian fashion by the laying on of hands of their brethren—after the manner recognised in the New Testament, before Bishops were supposed to have any spiritual powers different from those of other Elders—and they would not submit to be re-ordained as priests by a Bishop, and so implicitly confess that their former ministrations had been a fraud. Do these scruples seem to us too slight? Shall we regard as morbid that voice of conscience which bade them go out and suffer? 8,000 Nonconformists died in the horrible gaols of those days under

Charles II. Remember how they felt that they were carrying on the struggle of the past 100 years for a real Reformation, which should make the Church of England a true Protestant Church. That is what they tried to do; that is what they failed to do; that is what they have left for us to do. The fight they fought is not yet over. Everyone of the superstitions and abuses which vex the souls of good people now with these ever-recurring ecclesiastical crises is the natural and inevitable consequence of something against which those brave forefathers of ours uttered their protest and offered their noble sacrifice.

The Act of Uniformity, passed in 1662, established a compromise which no man could accept who had a high regard for truthfulness. The Thirty-Nine Articles are essentially Protestant; and the High Churchman, the Anglican Catholic, as he now likes to be called, has always had to explain them away in an unnatural sense. But the Low Churchman, the Evangelical, has to put still greater violence on the plain meaning of words every time he uses the Baptismal Service. That service declares, plain, as words can make it, that all men are born in sin and that the Sacrament of Baptism saves the child from the wrath of God; that pouring water on the brow of the baby, who should not be more than a fortnight old, and uttering the triple formula of Christian Baptism, performs the essential act of Regeneration and makes the Christian. Now, every Evangelical believes, as a fundamental principle, that no religious act can have any effect unless it is accompanied by an act of conscientious faith on the part of the recipient. Hence the practice of adult baptism by all the most thorough-going of the early Reformers. Have we not a right to be surprised that more Evangelical clergymen have not resigned their livings because they cannot conscientiously continue to use the Prayer-book?

At the present day, there is much outcry against High Churchmen, who are often told that they ought to join the Church of Rome. We may wish this were true, but it seldom is. Those who say this are generally ignorant of the facts. The High Churchmen have incomparably the best right of any of the three parties, to remain in the Church so long as the Prayer-book remains what it is. There are many things that matter little—vestments, candles, incense. There is one in which everything is involved, and that is the question of the priesthood. Are the only lawful ministers of the Christian Church those men who have been duly ordained as priests by a properly consecrated Bishop? The Prayer-book says: "Yes." Have these priests certain spiritual powers possessed by no one else—the power to consecrate the elements at the Lord's Supper, the power to give absolution and declare the Divine forgiveness of sin? The Prayer-book says they have. In the fundamental controversy of principle between the Protestant teaching of Justification by Faith, and the Catholic teaching of purification by Sacramental ceremony, the Book of Common Prayer is clearly, distinctly, on the side of Catholic ceremony. Her solemn service for the Ordering of Priests is unmistakeable and most impressive. Those who receive this Order of Priesthood are told:—"Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven, and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained; and be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God, and of His Holy Sacraments." That is what you are deliberately supporting if you support the Church of England. Sometimes there is a special outcry against the Confessional; but provision is made for that in the Prayer-book in connection with the Communion Service and the Visitation of the Sick; and a conscientious priest, anxious to know whose sins he should forgive and whose sins he must retain, may well think that the best way to find out is to hear confession.

For seventy years the High Church party has been gaining ground in the English Church. There has been an onward movement, and then a pause, and then another onward stride, but the ground gained is always in the same direction; and that is because the most earnest, conscientious, Church clergymen are the priests who feel that this Church is theirs, and who have a right to feel so while the Act of Uniformity remains the law of the land, establishing the Prayer-book in its present form. If you dread and dislike the claims of the priesthood, if you think that you can see in Romanism the evils to which they steadily lead, then be sure of this: that you will never carry on the work of the Protestant Reformation by conforming to a Church which insists that every minister of religion must be a priest, and which is compelled by its very constitution to be intolerant towards all who are guilty of the sin of schism. Only by Nonconformity can you hope to influence the destiny of a Church in which the best men are bound to take their priesthood seriously.

And finally, what can Nonconformity do, if it has itself no trust in truth and freedom? What can it do unless it recognises the voice of the living God as the only seat of authority in religion? Is the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes a good exchange for the Pope of Rome? If people want human authority, had they not better seek it in the most venerable Church in Christendom? Who hopes to settle difficulties nowadays by the simple appeal to the Bible which satisfied the early Protestants? It is our Freedom which has brought us to the Truth which we hold, and which we hold to be Truth, because we are free to accept what approves itself to our reason, and to reject that for which we cannot find sufficient evidence. This Truth is popularly known as Unitarianism. We did not deliberately adopt that name, but we are not ashamed of it, and do not mean to abandon it, while such an action would be sure to be misunderstood. But this we will let the world know: our Church-life originated in days long before there was any Unitarian controversy, and we have faith that it will continue long after this particular doctrinal discussion shall have passed away. What we do regard as permanent and essential is the principle of the Free pulpit, the Open Trust—that glorious inheritance from our Presbyterian forefathers. We would show the Christian world that it need not fear Freedom, for Freedom is the way to Truth, and Religion fears no Truth. When that principle is accepted by the Church of God in England, we can cease to be Nonconformists, and still remain faithful to our deepest convictions, and those mighty trusts left to us by our ancestors. Amen.

HIBBERT TRUST.

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF THE TRUSTEES.

IN presenting their twenty-fourth biennial report, the trustees have matter of more than usual interest to communicate.

It is now just forty-five years since the trusts of Mr. Hibbert's deed, which is dated July 19, 1847, came into operation upon the death of Mrs. Hibbert on February 15, 1854. The main object of the trusts of the deed—namely, “for the spread of Christianity in its simplest and most intelligible form,” and the various modes in which the trustees, acting under the wide discretionary powers which the founder so liberally and wisely bestowed upon them, are well known and need no repetition. During that long period the change that has taken place in the liberal tendencies of religious thought and opinion of this country has been very marked, and Mr. Hibbert's trustees cannot but feel grateful to the founder for the part, even though it be but a small one, which they, through his wise liberality, have been able to contribute to this movement.

It is therefore with peculiar satisfaction that they have to announce, and gratefully acknowledge, that during the present year they have received a considerable addition to their trust funds under the will of the late Mr. George Case. The trustees regard this confidence on Mr. Case's part as an emphatic testimony to the wisdom of Mr. Hibbert's original great gift. It has been in loyal execution of their founder's trust that they have carried on for so many years their scheme for encouraging students of proved ability, and in particular of aiding through the constitutional effort of Manchester College, now happily settled in Oxford, in the spread of “theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines.” They now look forward to a great enlargement of their efforts during the years to come.

It will perhaps be of interest to record in this report a few particulars of the history of the founder of the “Case Fund,” and all the more so because his course was spent in quiet and reserved devotion to intellectual perseverance and continuous Christian benevolence, which his habitual modesty concealed too much even from his associates and friends.

Mr. Case was the eldest son of Mr. John Deane Case, and grandson of Mr. George Case, a gentleman of the old school, formerly well known and much respected in Liverpool, who was, with Mr. William Roscoe, Mr. William Rathbone and others, one of a band of cultivated liberal friends who joined to institute the well-known Liverpool Athenæum, of which he indeed was the first President. Mr. Case matriculated at Brasenose College, Oxford, on June 9, 1841, at the age of 17. He graduated B.A. (First Class in Mathematics) in 1845, and M.A. in 1848. He then became a curate of All Saints' Church, Margaret-street, London. In 1850, shortly after the publication of a sermon* referring to the questions afterwards decided in the so-called “Gorham Judgment,” Mr. Case left the Anglican Communion and joined the Roman Catholic Church. An extract will sufficiently explain the reason for the preacher's having left the Church of England for that of Rome. He says, “It has been ruled that the Church of England allows her children to hold or to deny the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration.” . . . “The great danger is the seeming charity and toleration under which the evil is hid . . . but God will not have His Truth simply permitted.”

Mr. Case appears then to have taken refuge in Rome, where he resided for some time as a private student, and received the degree of D.D. He then returned to England and was appointed rector of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter at Gloucester, succeeding Canon Calderbank, and was himself made a canon of the diocese of Clifton.

During the discussions of the Vatican Council he preached a sermon which he afterwards also published.† This sermon gives sufficient indication that the preacher's position would be critical, if the personal infallibility of the Pope should be decreed. It contains strong protests against the assumption that that has been the general mind of the Church, and against the urgency of the Ultramontane Press in that direction. He was required to retract objectionable opinions so expressed, and eventually retired from his canonry, his mission, and the Roman Catholic Church.

It does not appear that Mr. Case published any other work than these two sermons, which may be regarded as conscientious and fearless efforts to speak out the truth that was in him. No other works appear under his name in the British Museum. Before he left Gloucester, he had devoted himself to the completion of St. Peter's Church, and is said himself to have added its spire. Roman Catholic friends and others still speak of him with deep respect and affection. Among other associates he was on terms of intimacy with the Rev. Thomas Teggins, then the respected Unitarian minister of the Barton-street Chapel there, and especially with the late Mr. W. P. Price, of Tibberton Court. After leaving the Church, Mr. Case resided chiefly in London, and during his residence there he was a frequent guest of Mr. Price's at the half-yearly dinners of the Trust, and used to follow with quiet attention such speeches as were, from time to time, delivered on those occasions by such leaders as Dr. Martineau, Dr. Sadler, and the lecturers and other friends of the Hibbert Trust. Doubtless it was his interest in the principles of the Trust, and the confidence he felt in its trustees, aroused by those meetings, and by close personal intimacy with Mr. Price and others, that led him ultimately to leave practically the whole residue of his property, subject to the life interest of his brother, to the Hibbert Trustees,—upon trust to apply the income in such manner as they in their uncontrolled discretion should think best, “for the promotion of Free Thought and the search after Truth, and of unfettered learning and frank utterance on matters connected with Religion, or with the nature and development and highest culture of man.” It may be permitted to friendship to record how Mr. Case endeared himself, especially in the freedom of private intercourse, by his abundant culture, his unflinching courtesy in discussion (in which he always seemed to understand the other side), and his kindly refinement in every sense.

When the Trustees published their last Report in June, 1897, Mr. Worsley Austin, Mr. Neander Anderton, and Mr. Joseph Warschauer held Scholarships. Mr. Austin having taken his M.A. degree at the Victoria University, the Trustees made him their customary present of £50, thus enabling him to spend the last six months of his Scholarship, which terminated in June, 1898, at Harvard University, and leading ultimately to his acceptance of an invitation to become Minister of the Unitarian Church at Dedham, Mass. Mr. Anderton's Scholarship also expired in June, 1898, and he shortly afterwards became associated with the Rev. C. J. Street in the Ministry of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton. Mr. Warschauer resigned his Scholarship in December last, on his appointment as Minister of the Oakfield-road Unitarian Church, Clifton. Having previously qualified himself provisionally for the Doctor's Degree of the Philosophical Faculty of the University of Jena, the Trustees have, at their Meeting this day, presented him with the sum of £50 in anticipation, and to assist him in the expenses he will have to incur in completing his Degree.

No application for a Scholarship was received in 1897, but at their Meeting last December the Trustees elected Mr. Alfred Hall, Student of Manchester College, a Scholar for one year with a stipend of £120, commencing at this date.

At their meeting last December, the trustees had under consideration a memorial from the Committee of Manchester College, calling attention to the loss the College was about to sustain in the resignation of the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., as one of its staff of Professors, and suggesting his appointment as Hibbert Lecturer on Comparative Religions, a subject which he had made peculiarly his own, and “of his own motion added instruction in it, to the duties undertaken by him” as Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature. After receiving a deputation from the College Committee in support of the memorial, the trustees expressed their willingness to grant the request preferred by it, so far as to appoint Professor Carpenter Hibbert Lecturer on the Comparative Study of Religions for one year from this date.

Last year the trustees received an application by Professor Carpenter for assistance in the publication of an “Analytical Edition of the Hexateuch,” and at their meeting last December they resolved to place a sum of £200 at the disposal of himself and his colleagues, towards the expenses of the work, expressing at the same time the hope that they might have fifty copies for disposal.

The trustees have also had before them an application, signed by a large number of their former Fellows and Scholars, to aid in the cost of publication of works of Theological Learning and Free Inquiry by scholars of repute, and have intimated their sympathy with the object of the application and their willingness to consider any definite proposal.

The trustees have continued their practice of making grants of money and books to their former scholars and others, and have recently, on the recommendation of the Principal and Professors of Manchester College, presented to the College Library a number of books for the use of its students.

The trustees record with regret several changes in their numbers, both by death and resignation, since the date of their last report.

In December, 1897, Mr. Thomas Ashton ceased to be a trustee consequent upon non-attendance through illness, and at the same date Mr. F. Taylor resigned his trusteeship. Both these vacancies, as well as that caused by the death of Sir J. C. Lawrence, recorded in the trustees' last report, were filled up by the election of Mr. Walter Baily, Mr. Henry P. Greg, and Mr. J. Alanson Pictor. Since these elections, two further vacancies have occurred in consequence of the death of Mr. Russell Martineau and non-attendance of Mr. C. W. Jones. At a special meeting of the trustees last January the following resolutions were passed:—

That this Meeting of Trustees, specially summoned for the purpose, desires to record its deep regret at the loss which the Trust has sustained in the death of their late colleague, Mr. Thomas Ashton. Although not one of the eighteen original Trustees, Mr. Ashton was elected a Trustee so long ago as June, 1858, and during the whole period of nearly forty years of his Trusteeship, he was most assiduous in his attendance at the Meetings of the Trust, and ever manifested the keenest interest in its business, which always engaged his most enlightened sympathies and the full contribution of his thought and counsel. His minute attention to the financial affairs of the Trust, were as noteworthy as his interest in its general and more special business. In thus recording the sense of their own loss, the Trustees desire also to express their sincere sympathy with Mrs. Ashton and the other members of Mr. Ashton's family in the loss they sustained in his death.

That this Meeting of Trustees, specially summoned for the purpose, seeks this the earliest opportunity, of recording the loss which the Trust has sustained by the death of Mr. Russell Martineau, M.A. In doing so, the Trustees desire to record their sincere regret at the too early determination of Mr. Martineau's co-operation in the business of the Trust, in which he manifested the sincerest interest. In thus expressing their own regret, the Trustees desire at the same time to offer their respectful condolence with Mrs. Martineau, Dr. Martineau, and the other members of his family.

P. LAWFORD, Secretary.

London, June 20, 1899.

HOWEVER perplexed you may at any hour become about some question of truth, one refuge and resource is always at hand: you can do something for someone besides yourself. When your own burden is heaviest, you can always lighten a little some other burden. At the times when you cannot see God, there is still open to you this sacred possibility to show God; for it is the love and kindness of human hearts through which the divine reality comes home to men. Let this thought, then, stay with you: there may be times when you cannot find help, but there is no time when you cannot give help.—G. S. Merriam.

WORLDLY AND SPIRITUAL LIFE.

At a recent meeting in Essex Hall, the relations between Religion and Modern Civilisation, between Modern Life and the Church, were discussed by a layman. Not long after I had the privilege to hear a discourse on the spiritual life and the worldly life by an eminent minister. I wish I had some small share of the literary power of the Rev. W. L. Watkinson, that I might describe the man and his speech. The occasion was the weekly midday service held at the Central Hall in Oldham-street, Manchester—a service organised, I believe, by Wesleyans, but conducted sometimes by ministers or eminent laymen of other evangelical bodies. Mr. Watkinson, who is editor of the London Quarterly Review, is a tall, thin gentleman, with glossy, silken grey hair. His voice is manifold but never strong. When he read the first twelve verses of the twelfth chapter of Romans, he alternated a high falsetto voice with one a full octave lower; whether this was intentional or unconscious, it had not a bad effect in the passage chosen. A shrill voice told us what we should not do, and a natural human voice told us what to do; a shrill voice stated the proposition, and a lower voice the corollary. From the Bible lesson the text was taken, "Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." Would that I could describe that address. Would that I could tell those movements of the right hand, round and about, here and there, sometimes actually explaining for us the words which the ear did not catch. Would that I could picture that beaming face, as the speaker, perhaps conscious that one-half the audience had missed the good thing just said, or thinking that a good thing was worth saying and hearing twice, repeated his phrase over again, and gave such a look with it that it seemed newer and brighter than ever. The purport of the address was this, that according to the New Testament there is no antagonism between the spiritual life and the worldly life. The Greeks might consider common industry as only fit for slaves; the Romans, like Cicero, might teach that nothing respectable ever came out of a shop; but the New Testament makes no such mistake. It does not depreciate the worldly life in contrast to the ascetic: it does not depreciate the worldly life in contrast to the ecclesiastic. The spiritual life has to be perfected by means of the worldly. This thesis was illustrated by references to art, music, and poetry, and it was shown that an "intellectual monk," one who kept himself aloof from realities, could not produce pictures, music, or poems that should have lasting worth and power. The illustrations were beautifully worked out, and most effectively spoken; but it was somewhat jarring when the speaker alleged, as the opinion of critics, that Beethoven's music became wooden towards the last (I believe I caught the word correctly) on account of his deafness; and again it jarred one to hear, on the authority of similar critics, that Milton's latest poems lacked fidelity to Nature, because Milton's long blindness had hidden Nature from him. I cannot set my authority against that of those great men—the unnamed critics—but I would rather have lost two points than have made them so.

By and by the thesis correlative to that enunciated above was insisted on: that the worldly life must be perfected by means of the spiritual. This, too, was as aptly illustrated. It was urged how great a debt civilisation owes to intellectual transcendentalism. A Secularist was quoted who likened the Christians who yearn for the unseen to a child crying for the moon. That child crying for the moon, said the lecturer, is the type of modern civilisation. Sir Isaac Newton held out his hand and cried for the moon, and when he grew up he got it! One of the lecturer's most applauded utterances (for people applauded with as much freedom as if they were in a theatre) was his reply to Professor Seeley's complaint of Religion being overweighed with the thought of the future life. The comparison of the influence of the Future Life idea with the influence of the Sun was an inimitable bit of rhetoric which must be heard and seen to be appreciated.

On the whole, two reflections predominate. First, a regret that Mr. Watkinson was not a Unitarian, or at the very least, a Stanleyite Churchman, because then he might have lost a certain hardness of judgment. Professor Seeley who distinctly claimed, in his Preface to "Natural Religion" (2nd edition), to be a Christian was as distinctly set forth by Mr. Watkinson as not a Christian. Second, one listens with some surprise to an address upon the relation of the spiritual and the secular life, from one of the most eminent preachers in the body whose main work is considered to be the saving of souls; an address, too, intended to be listened to by business men, and not in it one hint that business men, as such, have need of special warnings and admonitions; not even a word on the authority of nameless critics that certain business customs are unkindly, and certain other ones unscrupulous and unjust. Nay, the general impression was that the best possible business city was working in harmony with the best possible Church, and both the Church and the world are rapidly ripening for heaven. The Benediction, after such a discourse, must have been pronounced and received with much comfort to speaker and hearers.

J. RUDDLE.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

THE thirty-second annual meeting of the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union took place on Saturday last at Bradford.

There was service in the Chapel-lane Chapel at 3.45, the sermon being preached by the Rev. A. W. Fox, of Todmorden, who, in speaking of Sunday-school work, especially emphasised the necessity for Bible teaching.

At the close a collection was made on behalf of the funds of the Union. Special music was sung by the choir.

After tea in the new and commodious schoolroom, a public meeting was held in the Channing Hall, the Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES (in the absence of the retiring President, the Rev. J. G. Slater) presiding. Among those present were a number of ladies from various schools in the Union (school workers and friends), the Revs. Charles Hargrove, A. W. Fox, John Fox, J. H. Green, W. H. Eastlake, J. Ellis; Messrs. B. Boothroyd, G. Hargreaves, R. Silson, J. Harrison, F. G.

Jackson, W. Heeley, H. Dyson, P. R. Jackson, Fred. Clayton, E. Hill, Charles Stainer, Cave, Wadsworth, J. H. Brook, W. F. Ferro, &c. The Rev. J. A. Pearson (Oldham) and Mr. G. Whitfield were the delegates from the Manchester District and the North Midland Associations respectively.

The report, which was of an encouraging character, showed an increase in the aggregate number of scholars compared with that of the preceding year, there being also 571 scholars over sixteen years of age as against 554 last year. The schools were generally well staffed by earnest and efficient teachers, the good work being done in the schools being of a satisfactory character. The Conferences had been highly appreciated, some interesting papers having been given during the year. The examinations had also been a success, 344 scholars having presented themselves against 262 the previous year. Taken altogether, the report was considered very satisfactory, the state of the finances being equally gratifying, though more good work might be accomplished if the funds would allow.

The CHAIRMAN, after extending a most hearty welcome to Bradford, moved the adoption of the report and balance-sheet. He considered the report most encouraging, satisfactory, and straightforward. He felt convinced that excellent work was being done by the Union—work which it were impossible to set forth in a report. The increase in the number attending our schools was cheering, and especially so was the fact that there was an increase in the number of scholars over sixteen years of age. He looked upon it as a duty to train the scholars under their charge as members of our churches, believing that it was the main function of the Union to endeavour to induce them to join our churches, and also to become good members of society. As regarded the examinations, he was glad to find that there had been an increase in the number of entrants, because he felt convinced that good was being done by this agency. As one of the examiners in a religious subject, he might say that he was proud of the papers he had gone through, for not only did they show an extensive knowledge of the subject, but they were creditable both to scholars and teachers. Mr. Jones concluded by expressing his pleasure at the presence of so many young people on that occasion.

Mr. H. DYSON, in seconding, said he thought still more life might be infused into the work of the Union. He was of opinion that some plan might be formulated by which work similar to that which had been recently carried out at Oxford might be entered upon. He also thought more use ought to be made of the lantern belonging to the Union than had been the case up to the present time.

The resolution was carried.

The Rev. JOHN FOX having moved, Mr. FRED CLAYTON seconded, a cordial vote of thanks to the preacher of the day, a welcome was offered to the delegates from kindred Associations, on the motion of Miss COLLINS, seconded by Mr. J. H. BROOK.

Mr. WHITFIELD, in responding, observing that he should like to see a larger number of influential members of our congregations sympathising with and engaged in our Sunday-schools.

The following resolution was submitted by the Rev. CHAS. HARGROVE, seconded by Miss BROWN, and adopted silently:—

That this meeting hereby puts on record its grateful remembrance of the late Rev. Thomas Hincks, to whose suggestion and persevering efforts the foundation of our Union is due, he having been our first President.

The Rev. W. H. EASTLAKE proposed, Mr. B. BOOTHROYD seconded, a vote of thanks to the past officers, and nominating the following for the ensuing year:—President Mr. Fred. Clayton; vice-presidents, the Revs. C. Hargrove, E. Ceredig Jones, J. G. Slater, John Fox; Messrs. John Thornton and Henry Dyson; treasurer, Mrs. Griffith; secretaries, Messrs. B. Ferro and C. H. Boyle; book steward, Mr. P. R. Jackson; lantern steward, Mr. Jas. Harrison, auditor, Mr. G. Talbot; representative on London S.S.A. Committee, Mrs. Rawlings.

The resolution was carried, Mr. Fred Clayton responding.

The Bradford friends having been formally thanked for their hospitality, on the motion of Mr. F. G. JACKSON, and Miss HUDSON having replied, the Chairman received a similar compliment, and the meeting terminated with singing and prayer.

OUR FETE.

THE depreciation in value of agricultural lands has reduced the income from our endowment to less than half its former value, and in spite of the splendid efforts of our people the chapel finances have for some time shown a small balance every year on the wrong side. We are one of the feeders of the Unitarian life of the towns, since almost all our young people drift thitherwards in the end. So as each year brings its own burden, and the total indebtedness was beginning to alarm us, we resolved to wipe it out. That was the origin of our fête. Of course, in a country place like Tenterden, lying in the very heart of "the garden of England," there are plenty of fields available, but by the kindness of one of our supporters we secured about the best field we could possibly have chosen, situated within the town itself, having a firm, true tennis ground in the centre and a hedge of young trees and flowering shrubs to surround us with shade and beauty. So soon as the idea was fairly floated everybody worked with a will to secure success. Our ladies' sewing party gave every available moment of their time, and every lady member of the congregation set herself to fashion things of beauty and utility for the fancy stall. The Town Clerk printed off a huge pile of photographs of the most lovely and picturesque bits of local scenery; another member of Committee undertook the management of an Aunt Sally; his wife took charge of a Bran Pie; one lady organised a Second-hand Book-stall; Flower and Refreshment Stalls were not lacking; button-hole vendors were in evidence; and a family of sisters actually composed, illustrated, and printed a newspaper commemorative of the event. A party of fair ladies gave us Romborg's Toy Symphony; an amateur string band provided music for our dancing ring; and a group of sixteen dainty little maidens performed the Maypole dance in a manner which did great credit to the lady who had trained them. When the Fête was opened by the President of our Provincial Assembly, six tents, adorned on the outside with bunting and evergreens and loaded in the inside with the product of many hours of loving toil, stood ready to receive the purchasers, while the short and velvety grass was dotted all around with intending merry-makers. All through the afternoon, in the glad sunshine, groups of friends swept through the field, standing to watch the children sporting on the green, consulting the gipsy in her realistic bower, listening to the music, making life bearable with ices or cooling drinks, later on joining in the dance, and ever and anon turning aside to purchase the tempting novelties or needed clothing exposed for sale. Here was a tiny little maiden hawking about some Persian kittens in her doll's perambulator, and there a boy with rabbits slung in a basket round his neck, while an even tinier child acted as sandwich-man for the Fête newspaper. One could look in no direction without being greeted with glimpses of the beautiful country side, while a continuous ripple of conversation and laughter made evident the fact that our fête was at any rate a social success. Everyone was busy, everyone was happy, and all were breathing the purest of air. There were no intoxicants, no raffling, no overcharging; yet, when the day's takings were counted up, we found to our great joy that we had gained more than we needed, and were secured against a deficit not only for the present, but for another year at least; which has made us all very eager to press our congratulations upon the untiring ladies to whose efforts the success of our fête is due.

MR. E. H. COYSH writes to us from Newcastle-on-Tyne, telling of the service conducted last Sunday evening by Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal at Gateshead. The order of the first part of the service was by special request that of the Brahmo Somaj, and was so impressive that Mr. Coysh suggests its adoption by other congregations, where Mr. Pal may preach. The service, for which a printed form was used, opened with the following Invocation, said by minister and people, all standing:—

Thou art our Father, like a Father do Thou teach us wisdom; forsake us not, O Father; allow us not to be led into destruction, O Lord; O Father, forgive us our sins and our ignorance, and fill us with only that which is good.

Then after a hymn, Exhortation by the minister, and another hymn, came the Adoration, with a few moments meditation. A note added at the foot said:—

In the liturgy of the Brahmo Somaj, here the minister and congregation repeat a Sanskrit formula from the Vedas, which may be translated as follows:—"The Brahman (the Supreme Being) is absolute Truth, absolute Reason, the Blessed, the Good, the Infinite and Eternal, the absolutely Holy, and the One without a Second," and then the minister dwells briefly upon these attributes of the Deity.

Minister and people then said together the following prayer, all standing:—

From untruth lead us to truth: from darkness lead us to light: from death lead us to Life eternal: O, most merciful Lord, in Thy great love do Thou keep us for ever.

After another hymn came the sermon, and the service concluded as is usual with us, the Lord's Prayer being chanted before the Benediction.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Sunday-school Treats.

Pleasant and successful summer treats are reported by the Sunday-schools of Ainsworth, Chichester, and Stannington.

Atherton (Chowbent).—A united procession of all the Nonconformist Sunday-schools, including the Unitarian, which is the largest, and numbered 520, the Baptists, 460, Wesleyans, Primitives, Independents, and Missions, took place on Saturday last. Favoured with fine weather, the great procession of nearly 3,000 scholars, teachers, and friends, with bands and school banners, passed through the principal streets of the township, and was watched by many thousands of spectators. Parents naturally take some pride in dressing their children for this procession, and the work of the Sunday-school is brought prominently before the whole neighbourhood in this united manner. After the procession each school passed to its own field for tea, &c.

Deal.—The Rev. T. Shakespeare, of the Home Missionary College, after preaching for the last two months, has received a hearty invitation to take charge of the church for the next six months. The chapel has been cleaned and painted, and other needful repairs attended to, and the garden planted with flowers by a good friend of the cause. Mr. Shakespeare has advertised an attractive and helpful series of subjects, and it is hoped that visitors staying in the town will encourage with their presence and help the few who stand for Liberal Christianity in this fast-growing seaside resort.

Elland.—On Sunday, July 2, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held in connection with the above church. Mr. A. Whitworth, of Huddersfield, gave an address to the scholars, teachers, and friends at the morning service; the Rev. James Taylor, minister of the church, preached in the afternoon and evening. Special hymns and anthems were sung at each of the services, and collections were taken in behalf of the school funds. On the following Saturday, July 8, a garden party was held at Ivy House. The total receipts of the Sunday services and the garden party amount to over £11. Apart from the financial result of these services, the late anniversary was one of the most successful ever held at the chapel.

Evesham.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held at the Oat-street Chapel on Sunday week, when special sermons were preached by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, of Bath. In the evening a flower service was held, in the course of which, while a hymn was being sung, the children brought up offerings of flowers, which were received by the minister, and were afterwards sent to London hospitals. The collections amounted to £5 8s.

Flagg.—Sunday, July 9, was a red-letter day for the little band of faithful Unitarians who hold up the torch of rational Christianity at this out-of-the-world station in the High Peak of Derbyshire. It was the occasion of the anniversary. The special feature was the dedication of a stained-glass window erected by the lay-preachers and many friends in the North Midland and Manchester districts. The subject is Jesus at the Well of Samaria. Underneath is the inscription "To the Glory of God, and in loving memory of Charles Woollen who died April 11, 1898, aged 82 years. Erected by many friends as a tribute to his transparent goodness, and in appreciation of his self-denying labours during many years for the congregation worshipping in this chapel." The Rev. John Ellis of Uppertorpe, Sheffield, who has charge of the chapel since Mr. Woollen's death, was the preacher. He took the incident which the window admirably depicts as the subject of his afternoon discourse, and showed how in many ways it might recall features of Mr. Woollen's consistent and gracious life. There were good congregations. The afternoon service was attended by many friends from Sheffield. Miss Widdowson sang "I know that my Redeemer liveth," with impressive effect. At the evening service addresses were given by Mr. S. D. Hall of Derby, Mr. S. A. Gittins of Nottingham, and Rev. John Ellis. The chapel was beautifully decorated with flowers.

Gateshead.—On Sunday last Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal preached in the Beaconsfield Hall a most eloquent sermon on "God and the World." The building was crowded to overflowing.

Horwich.—On Sunday afternoon last in the place of the usual lessons the five delegates whom—largely through the generosity of a friend—the school was able to send to the Oxford Summer School for Teachers gave reports of their experiences, impressions, &c. Great interest was shown in the proceedings by those present. The delegates spoke in the highest terms of the kindness they, in common with others, had received while at Oxford. It was gratifying and delightful to know how thoroughly they had grasped the essence of the subjects treated; how, moreover, they had been impressed by the beautiful both in Manchester College and without its walls.

Hull.—Mr. B. Nagarkar, who was detained in this port by delay of the ship which carries him back to Bombay, spoke at the evening service at Park-street Church a few farewell words. He found in the similar development of liberal religion a link between the contemplative East and the active West. The Brahmo Somaj resembled the Unitarian movement in its substitution of the inner for the outer authority, in its progress from a starting-point within the pale of orthodoxy, in its new reconciliation of religious theory and practical ethic. He appealed for a closer fraternity between the two, in which, said Mr. Nagarkar, the East would have perhaps as much to give as to gain.

Kingswood, near Birmingham.—On Sunday, July 16, anniversary services were held, when the Rev. Principal Gordon, M.A., of Manchester, preached. There were good congregations at both services. At the close of the morning service, in accordance with an ancient custom, buns were distributed to the Sunday-school children.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—This congregation has just succeeded in selling the present church building, which is situated a short distance from the centre of the town, and hopes shortly to commence building a new church and schools in one of the growing suburbs. The sum realised, after paying off a mortgage of £300, will form a good nucleus of a building fund, towards which it is hoped that the support of many friends will be received. Mr. Charles Kempson has generously offered his services as architect.

London: George's-row.—The annual window-gardening show was held at the Mission on July 11 (Tuesday). By the kindness of Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, the plants were judged by his head gardener, Mr. Anderson, as usual, and Mr. Nettlefold also sent a large number of beautiful plants to be given away as honourable mentions to the exhibitors. It was the largest and best show held for years—over 400 plants being sent in. In the evening the chair was taken by Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, and the prizes were given away by Mrs. Alfred Lawrence. Mr. Spurgeon, assisted by Mrs. Clare, amused the audience (which was large) by humorous songs and duet. The evening ended with a speech from Mr. Summers, thanking all those who had given their services.

London: Peckham.—A quarterly meeting of the Avondale-road congregation was held on Tuesday, the proceedings being for the most part of a social character. An interesting feature of the evening was a short but impressive address by Mr. Bagg, the doyen of the congregation, whose presence after severe illness was most warmly welcomed. He urged the zealous support on the part of the congregation, that he himself could no longer give to their minister, and especially in the open-air services that had been announced that evening.

London: Wandsworth.—Last Saturday at a garden party, given to the members of the congregation at Oakfield, Wimbledon, by Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Schwann, a presentation was made to Mr. Charles Fenton of an address, Sir J. Lubbock's hundred best books and a bracelet for Mrs. Fenton, in recognition of his great services rendered to the congregation as secretary from 1887 to 1899. The presentation was made by Mr. Schwann, on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. Fenton having acknowledged the gifts, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant also added a few words.

Newcastle, Staff.—The 184th anniversary of the Old Meeting House was celebrated on Sunday, July 9, when two sermons were preached by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., Principal of the Home Mission College, Manchester. The congregation was rather small in the morning, but very good in the evening. A very pleasing feature of the anniversary was the way in which a number of friends from various choirs came to assist in the rendering of several anthems.

Swansea.—On Sunday, July 9, a special meeting of the Sunday-school scholars and teachers was held in the school-room, when addresses were delivered by the minister, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Mrs. Reid, and Mr. D. Harries, the superintendent of the school. Recitations and solos were given by the children, and special hymns were sung, under the leadership of Mr. Phillip Jones. The attendance was large. On the following Wednesday over 100 scholars, teachers, and friends proceeded to the Mumbles, and a most pleasant afternoon was spent. Tea was provided at Bracelet Bay. The progress of the school is highly satisfactory.

Wakefield.—The annual flower services were held on Sunday, July, 16 Rev. John Ellis, of Sheffield, being the preacher. In the evening he spoke to the children on "Nature's Voices." Special anthems were sung at the morning and evening services. The singing of special hymns at all the services, but especially at the afternoon gathering of young people, was most hearty.

Wareham.—On Sunday, July 9, a flower service was held, the chapel being decorated, and some of the best of the flowers were despatched the same evening to the Mansford-street Mission, Bethnal Green. Mrs. William Carter, of Parkstone, occupied the pulpit, and her thoughtful and earnest discourse was much appreciated by all who were present.

Whitchurch.—The annual flower service was held in the Church of the Saviour on Sunday, July 6, the Rev. W. F. Turland being the preacher. The church was very tastefully decorated by members of the guild, and the services were well attended.

REPAIRS TO THE PRESBYTERIAN CHAPEL, NEWBURY.

The Unitarian Congregation at Newbury are making an effort to put their Chapel into a state of efficient repair, and a Service and Public Meeting—of which a full report appeared in THE INQUIRER of July 15—were held on July 7 last, to commence a fund for that purpose.

The Chapel, which was built in 1697, has an interesting history; James Pierce, Daniel Mace, David James, William Wilson, and other men well known among Unitarians, having been connected with it.

The building is still structurally sound, and at a comparatively small expense may be preserved in usefulness for many years to come.

The congregation have in the last few years expended a considerable amount in repairs and improvements, but they now find a further outlay urgently required, which they are unable without help to meet, and they confidently appeal to Unitarian friends for aid to complete the work.

The cost is estimated as follows:—

Repairs and painting to walls and woodwork	£50
Heating Apparatus ...	£50
Rebuilding Vestry ...	£150

This building is very small and inconvenient, and as the roof is in a very bad state it is proposed to rebuild it entirely.

Donations, which are earnestly requested, should be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. T. H. STILLMAN, 133, Bartholomew-street, Newbury, and they will be acknowledged in THE INQUIRER and Christian Life.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is a great pleasure at this time of the year to meet with brethren of our fellowship from across the Atlantic. The Rev. T. Van Ness, who preached recently at Richmond, has gone to Russia, to visit Count Tolstoi, whose friendship he has enjoyed for some time, and to Hungary, where he hopes to persuade some representatives of the ancient Unitarian Church of Transylvania, to attend the International Congress of Unitarians to be held next year in Boston. On the same errand the Rev. C. W. Wendte is proceeding by way of Norway to Sweden and Germany, of which his family two generations ago was native. Mr. Wendte's splendid work as Superintendent on the Pacific coast is still fresh in our memory. As a boy, Theodore Parker's hand was laid upon his head, and after the refreshment of his present holiday we shall confidently hope that some new field of labour will claim his eager and devoted spirit. During the past week the Rev. E. A. Horton, of Boston, has also been among the visitors at Essex Hall.

THERE are many points of interest in the Rev. J. Harwood's sermon, which we publish this week, telling the story of the Effra-road congregation, during the sixty years of its existence, and none, perhaps, of greater interest than that which refers to the original trust, and the endeavour subsequently made to rectify what is now generally felt to be a mistake. To tie up a chapel to the opinions of Priestley and Belsham, unexceptionable as the original motive may have been, could not fail to have disastrous results. But, happily, the ground on which the chapel was built was held on lease; and the freehold having been since secured by a friend and presented to the congregation, when the lease expires the chapel will remain in their hands, and continue to be held on a perfectly open trust.

THE London Bazaar of 1900 is to have a Welsh stall, the promoters of the Welsh services at Essex Hall having formed themselves into a committee for that purpose. They have issued an appeal to their compatriots, both in London and the Principality, asking for help to make the stall worthy of the occasion and of their country. Early in the coming winter it is intended to give a series of concerts and lectures with the same object in view, and Mr. Delta Evans has already promised a lecture on "The Proverbs of our Country, and their Influence upon the National Character." Communications may be addressed to the Hon. Sec. of the Welsh Movement, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

THE Rev. Charles Travers, of Carlisle, has published two lectures, which he recently delivered in the Viaduct (Unitarian) Church, on "Archdeacon Diggle and Unitarianism." The lectures are a vigorous criticism of Mr. Diggle's two articles on Unitarianism, to which we made some reference last week. In his criticism Mr. Travers makes effective use of Dr. Rashdall's "Doctrine and Development," Mr. Beeby's "Creed and Life," Dr. Llewelyn Davies's "Spiritual Apprehension," and other works of liberal theologians. The lectures may be had from the author at Carlisle, or at the Book-room, Essex Hall (2d., 2½d. by post).

THE strange cross-currents of religious life have been illustrated in a striking manner during the past week. While the Archbishops have concluded their "Hearing" on the subject of the reservation of the Sacrament, and have received evidence of the surrender of a section of the English clergy to what, with all respect for honest conviction, we can only regard as a most lamentable superstition, the Nonconformists of London have given an enthusiastic welcome to a party of Frenchmen, until recently priests or monks in the Roman Catholic Church. Eighteen of them were welcomed on Sunday afternoon at the Methodist meeting at St. James's Hall, and in the evening at Dr. Horton's Chapel at Hampstead. M. Bourrier, the originator of the movement, is now editor of the Chrétien Français, the organ of the revolting priests, which has already a circulation of 10,000, and is widely read in the clergy houses throughout France. M. Bourrier is a man of fine appearance, and speaks eloquently, but only in his own language. He and his eighteen companions are the vanguard of a much larger body; some of them are becoming Methodist ministers, but the majority, of whom M. Bourrier is the leader, hope for a movement of reform from within the Church.

At the opening of the Representative Session of the Wesleyan Conference on Monday, after a sacramental service, the new President, the Rev. F. W. Macdonald, delivered his inaugural address. Having referred with satisfaction to the progress of the past year, he said that Wesleyan Methodism was singularly free from the spirit of sacerdotalism, and there was no desire among them for priestly assumption. He hoped that as Methodists they would take an increased share in all that pertained to the religious life of the country. In the past they had kept very much to themselves, and had their own weights and measures. Whilst it was their duty to preserve intact the great heritage bequeathed to them, it was equally their duty to take their proper position in the general Christian plan and thought of the times—to be in the very forefront in co-operation with all who are serving the Lord Jesus Christ. On the following day the Committee of the Twentieth Century Fund reported that the total amount now promised was 669,214 guineas, or £702,674. Of this, £86,572 had been already paid.

At Wednesday's meeting of the Wesleyan Conference the following resolution, of which he had given notice, was moved by the Rev. Thomas Champness :—

That, in view of the dreadful results of drunkenness, and the way the drink traffic is injuring the home and Church life of our country, this Conference is of opinion that no Christian man should manufacture or sell intoxicating liquor.

He said he was fully aware that those who were in favour of his resolution were a small minority, but they were strong in their conviction. They felt it was time that Methodism spoke out on the subject. Any complicity Methodism had with the traffic was detrimental to her welfare. The Rev. Dr. Stephenson then moved as an amendment :—

That the Conference rejoices in the rapid spread of temperance convictions and practices in the Methodist Church, and urges our people everywhere to consider all well-promoted temperance reforms, and confidently hopes for their success, but it declines to pronounce an abstract and indiscriminate opinion upon the action of individual Christians.

He did not hold a brief for brewers, and as was well known he had been himself for forty-two years an earnest advocate in the cause of temperance. Two interests were now at stake, the interests of the Church of God, and those of the great temperance movement. What would a split now mean to all the interests of Methodism? Adopt such a resolution as that submitted by Mr. Champness and they would have to go further, and not only deal with the sellers but also with the buyers. The Wesleyan Methodist Church was not a temperance society. It had been said that this proposal was not legislation, but an expression of opinion. He contended that it was a question of discipline which would be used especially by intemperate zeal. The Rev. Charles Garrett seconded the amendment. He hated the drink traffic with intense and increasing hatred; but that was not the question. The question was, Should they coerce or should they convert? Let them not turn out, but rather gather in. Dr. Stephenson's amendment was then put, and carried by a large majority.

REFERRING to the recent celebrations at the reopening of the City-road Chapel, the Spectator wrote in very high terms of Wesley's services to England. No one else, the writer of the article was inclined to think, had influenced the life of England in so direct, palpable, and powerful a way.

We do not, of course, forget that Wesley was but one of a number of religious teachers and reformers whom we identify with the movement towards what we may call "vital religion." We do not forget the gentle poet of the movement, William Cowper, nor the sweet hymnist, Charles Wesley, nor the wonderful preacher, George Whitefield. We must not even forget contemporary movements in other lands, which we are apt to lose sight of under the great stress of the French Revolution, but which have a vital union with the English Methodist revival. But when all is said and done John Wesley remains the one supreme and towering figure, a characteristic product of England, and one of the noblest and most saintly of her sons.

And, further, contemplating the possible decadence of this country in the last century, it was added:—

As Rousseau roused Europe from dead beliefs to living ideas, so did Wesley rouse England from death in "trespasses and sins" to a new life of divine possibilities. What the mechanical morals of sleepy Anglican rectors could not do for England, this holy man with his soul aflame with a sacred zeal and love accomplished. Think of those poor degraded miners with the tears making white channels down their black faces, and their hearts full of the new teaching that the world was the outcome of divine love and themselves the objects of divine care. It was as truly a revelation to them as to the weary slaves of ancient Rome. It transformed life for them, for it began at the right end, by making obedience to moral law easy in the light of Christian grace and love. Moreover, no spiritual renewal stops at purely spiritual results; it overflows the whole nature and tends to produce good fathers and good citizens as well as saints. We owe it largely to the Methodist movement that, while the French could only renew their outworn structure by violent revolution, the English could transform theirs by peaceable means. Yet Wesley was no quietist, no retiring ascetic. He faced the evils of his time as boldly as Savonarola.

THE Guardian of last week had a very frank note on the subject of Disestablishment, in warning to those who were impatient and irritated by the restrictions now placed on the Church by the State, and asked how anyone calling himself a Churchman could wish the Bride of Christ to remain for a moment in that humiliating position.

The answer—the conclusive answer, as it seems to us—is that to all appearance Establishment is the barrier which saves us from disruption. If Churchmen were but agreed among themselves the arguments for and against Disestablishment would be so equally balanced that we might be fairly indifferent which way the decision went. The case is different so long as there is real reason to believe that disruption may follow upon Disestablishment. People are apt to forget that comprehensiveness is the special note of Established Churches. When the members of a voluntary Church feel strongly on theological questions the disposition to part company rather than to tolerate one another's opinions may easily become irresistible. We do not say that cases may not be imagined in which disruption would be unavoidable in an Established Church. There is a limit even to comprehension. But this limit will necessarily be reached much sooner in a voluntary Church than in an Established Church, since in the one case the toleration of inconsistent teaching is the act of the Church and in the other it is the act of the State. If the Church had been disestablished at the time of the Gorham case, or of the Bennett case, or of the ritual cases, the danger of disruption would have been extreme. It would be less so now, because in the interval there has been an appreciable approach to agreement among Churchmen. But Disestablishment would subject this growing agreement to a very rude test, and we have not yet been shown any good reason for provoking the application of that test. So long as Parliament makes no attempt to alter the fundamental conditions of the union between Church and State our established position does us no serious harm, while by preventing us from accentuating our divisions it does us real good.

In a recent Sunday evening sermon in Westminster Abbey, Canon Armitage Robinson spoke of overcrowding in London. Taking for text Mark viii. 2, he asked what form the compassion of Jesus would now take, if he came again, and visited that great city:—

"You would see Him entering the overcrowded room, but 10 ft. square, where father, mother, three or four children, and an adult lodger are herded unspeakably together; where beds are slept under, as well as slept in; where all the cooking, washing, drying must be done, and often a trade must be carried on besides. And then, if perchance this one case of a thousand were reported, and the stern arm of the law intervened, you would see Him watching still with unutterable emotion, as father, mother, children were turned into the street with no hope of finding within several miles even so scanty a dwelling-place as this. And presently He would come to His Christian folk, who were gathered to confess His name, and say, 'I have compassion on the multitude, for, indeed, they have no room to live.' That, at any rate, is the message which I have dared to bring you in His name to-night." Could the Church be deaf to the cry? Some remedy must be found for the evil produced by the ever-increasing population, the blessed were those who had set themselves in any way to mitigate the trouble. Two immediate causes of overcrowding were excessive rents and insufficiency of houses, the former largely the result of the latter. But was it a Christian business to grind the faces of the poor? "The chief hope of alleviation at present seems to be the building, on a very large scale, of blocks of workmen's tenements, to be let at rents within the reach of the ordinarily poor. The municipal authorities must enter into the competition if rents are to be brought to a proper level, and if anything like a sufficiency of room is to be provided. The evil is enormous; it is growing; it must be dealt with, statesman, politician, philanthropist, economist, vestryman, clergyman, district visitor—all of us must combine to seek a remedy. . . . It is the Mission of the Church to interpret from age to age the one Gospel of Christ in terms which may meet every recurring need. The Gospel has its message of hope to the overcrowded and the homeless; it has blessed the poor from the beginning until now. But it has also its message to the landlord of the slums, and to the shareholders in companies that trade on the miseries of the overcrowded—and a very stern message it must be. To the man who comes to church on Sundays and professes to honour the name of Christ, and on Monday collects exorbitant rents from extreme poverty, and who is a party, however indirectly, to a system by which poor people are crowded by high rents or insufficient room into indecency, and sickness and death, to that man Christ will say—read the Gospel and you shall find for yourself what He will say. And in vain shall you plead, 'I never knew what wrong was being done!' for you might have known, and you ought to have known. You took your rent or your dividend, and the very largeness of it should have told you that it was the price of blood."

COLONEL INGERSOLL, whose death is announced from New York, was born in 1832, the son of a Congregational minister. For some years he practised as a lawyer, in partnership with his brother, in the State of Illinois, and when the Civil War broke out, raised a regiment of cavalry, of which he was appointed colonel. In 1866 he became Attorney-General for his State. He was, however, most widely known as an agnostic lecturer, gifted with eloquence and a great fund of humour and sarcasm, which he expended in attacks on current theological beliefs and Christianity as a religious system. His strong and tender humanity attracted many who could have little sympathy with his attacks upon religion. Trenchant as were many of his criticisms of unreasonable doctrine, he had no conception of a profounder spiritual truth, out of reach of such weapons as he wielded with so much popular effect. Ingersoll has been compared to Spurgeon in his racy style and pure Saxon English. A connection, by contrast, might also not be far to seek between such theology as was taught by the one, and the other's iconoclasm.

In the report of the Hibbert Trust which we published last week, it was stated that one of the late scholars, the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, now minister at Dedham, Mass., took his Master's degree at Victoria University. It should have been London University.

CARLYLE'S "SARTOR RESARTUS."

II.—PHILOSOPHY OF CLOTHES.

It is in accord with the theory of clothing set forth in "Sartor Resartus" that the book in which Carlyle expresses himself upon the subject should exhibit his ideas partly in German phraseology, and should be represented as a lengthy review of a German work upon the subject; for it was from German sources that Carlyle learned to interpret his intellectual difficulties and to settle down into practical purpose. To Goethe he wrote: "To you I owe the all precious knowledge and experience that Reverence is still possible: that instead of conjecturing and denying, I can again believe and know"; and the description given by Goethe in Faust of the work of the earth-spirit is manifestly one of the luminous ideas which took root in Carlyle and helped to produce "Sartor Resartus":—

"I sit at the whirling loom of Time
And weave the living garment of God."

Carlyle's genius led him to write as much of the supposed author as of that author's philosophy. "Clothes: their Origin and Influence," is the title of the supposed volume; but to understand the human being, the clothed animal, we need to do something more than to classify his parts and his methods. A philosophy in the abstract is not a complete philosophy of man, for man is not an abstraction; nor is the philosophy of the universe at all complete—it lacks, indeed, essential elements which may entirely alter its conclusions—so long as it is woven intellectually without constant reference to the emotions and passions and will of men and women. Carlyle's "Sartor" philosophy, at any rate, teaches that the thought of God, which is our philosophy, is expressed in concrete facts of life, while, however, it far transcends them. The clothing of God's ideas expresses them, under such forms as we can apprehend in our present condition. One passage of Carlyle must be quoted:—

"All visible things are emblems. What thou seest is not there on its own account; strictly taken it is not there at all: Matter exists only spiritually and to represent some idea and body it forth. On the other hand, all emblematic things are properly Clothes, thought-woven or hand-woven. Whatsoever sensibly exists, whatsoever represents Spirit to Spirit, is properly a Clothing, a suit of Raiment, put on for a season and to be laid off. Thus, in this one pregnant subject of Clothes, rightly understood, is included all that men have thought, dreamed, done, and been: the whole external universe and what it holds is but clothing, and the essence of all Science lies in the Philosophy of Clothes."

So Carlyle seeks the meaning of every manifestation under the sun or elsewhere in the universe, assured that all creation and every part of creation can reveal God, if we will look through the symbol to the reality which it represents to us; while to rest merely upon the outward and present appearance of things, looking no deeper, is to regard merely the clothing. All things which we can see or know are manifestations of the one Reality, God: the conditions under which we see and know them are those of Space and Time. We cannot free ourselves of these innate ideas, or conditions of thought: yet are they human vestments of God belonging to the circumstances of our present life, and not eternal. Such is the philosophy upon which Carlyle built his dissertation upon Clothes, and toward which and other deep spiritual and moral experiences connected therewith, he shows the development of his own—and others—inner life in the personification of Teufelsdröckh.

There are two opposite erroneous ways of understanding "clothes philosophy," both of which have many permanent adherents, and each of which has fascinated or conquered a good many of us at different periods of our development.

(1) This world reveals all we can know of God in symbols, by law and order, and beauty, and light, and human character: why not rest as happily as may be in the enjoyment of these things, since they are the vestment of God whom no man hath seen at any time? This world, or this Kosmos rather, reveals in symbol what we can know of Him. Live now in the present; trouble not about what thou canst not fathom or see!—But the interpretation of the living present is withheld, or grows dim if we find not God also transcendent to the Kosmos. The vestments of Nature speak not of Him unless there be an interpreting divine power, drawn also from Him, within ourselves: "He hath revealed them to us by His spirit." In the darkness of life, outward darkness, Teufelsdröckh himself resisted the Devil and grew strong to face Destiny, not in reliance on the symbolism of the creation, but in reliance on the integrity of righteousness and the eternity of absolute good. Consciously or unconsciously, the soul that finds God does so by a more immediate reliance upon Him than His expression in the Kosmos.

(2) Since this world is but a vestment that passes away, with all the opinions and fancies and business connected with it, what matters anything it can give or take? Is it not true life to dwell in continuous divine reverie regardless of all appearances, to draw deeper and deeper into the soul of all things, caring less for any circumstance or earthly relation, until all physical feeling or reliance upon outward things is gone, and we become pure spirit unhampered by clothes of any description, lost to the world in a divine ecstasy in which we are found of God?—Yet are certain vestments and physical needs (symbolical as well as practical) forced upon us. We are born into a world of eating and drinking: is it then without any divine purpose that we are so placed? Shall we reach a greater spiritual height by an effort to thwart Providence? We are born with need of clothing so long as we live in this world: why strive to go hence before God calls us? Eating, drinking, clothing for the body, are all symbolic and may be made more symbolic of divine things until we rise through them past the need of them. The outward world waits our seeing eyes to know and interpret it as God physically manifested. If we strive to leave these things before we have learned them and turned them to the noblest uses, shall we necessarily advance to a higher stage, or shall we not, more likely, sink to worse, or miss some important period of our development? If we could advance to higher realms without learning this world's lessons, we might have an everlasting need and emptiness in our angelic life, to be filled and completed never till we had again made pilgrimage into the realm of the actual, wherein God is seen through His living vestments. If we shut ourselves out or in from the influence of actual life of Nature or of man, we inevitably stunt our growth in greater slavery to the less exalted material life of selfish care, or rise too rapidly in slender and unhealthy emotionalism or sentimental religion, which exhausts the roots and dies away to exhaustion.

The living actual present is our sphere of action wherein we may read God's message. Even in old clothes, old customs and habits, which need to be cast away and must be given up with the advent of better days, there is record of the divine that has been. Realms in which Carlyle was not a ruler, such as Art and Poetry, are manifest examples of the truth of his philosophy. The church organisations, hierarchies, and creeds are clothing, good so long as they fit, but to be put away when we outgrow them. Man's body is a revelation in the flesh. Society clothes itself with customs, many of them expressing its foolishness. Its excesses of inept irreligion are typified by Mr. J. Edmund Sullivan in the excellent illustration in his new edition of "Sartor" of "the Real and its Ideal," the beautiful female form standing in admiration before an ugly, unseemly, and wickedly-constructed fashionable garment. Here is typified the irreligion which Carlyle saw in Society, which often worshipped evil rather than good, the expression of its falsehood and ignorant vanity.

The fleshly clothing which we inherit, like the customs and habits we are trained to follow, is the expression of the goodness and badness, the mingled excellence and degradation of our family ancestors and teachers and the race to which we belong. They are no personal credit to us and no disgrace, seen in the light of the eternities. But they are modified by our essential personal life, and the features of the aged man or woman are often significant of much that is really their own character and attainment ere they lay them aside at death.

All outward things, seen by the eye, heard by the ear, felt, scented, or imagined, are significant of eternal verities. The spirit which lives with God sees more and more of the significance of symbols, while it sees deeper and deeper beneath the symbol to the reality. That diseased wretch is significant of sin; but whose sin? Not necessarily his own! Perhaps he is bearing the burden of another's wickedness. That sweet and wholesome looking girl, proud of her good looks and of other's admiration of them, may be laying up stores of evil for others to suffer, while she vaunts the clothing for which the pure lives of her ancestors and the care of her neighbours have paid.

Look deep! Clothes are symbols of realities of moral and religious import; but look deep, not only at the symbol and its instruction. Remember, before all the products of life is the producer. His works speak of him, but he is greater than his work. Read the symbol, but sympathise with the man who made it, whom it imperfectly bodies forth. Love is the means without which you will know no human being, nor God Himself. Knowing God by the life of the spirit which is love, you will see the beauty and excellence of His temporal symbols, them through Him and Him in them; and your fellow men you will also learn to know, and take your side with their goodness against their wrongfulness, and ally your earnest spirit with the good that is in your own temporal vestment; so that you and they may grow beyond the need of it, but may not seek to cast it from you while it is still of use.

LITERATURE.

A LIFE FOR LIBERTY.*

THE recent meeting at Essex Hall for Mr. Booker T. Washington and the light that he threw on the Negro Question in America give a special interest to this book. It furnishes sketches, in a graphic style, of the anti-slavery work forty years ago, and describes one of the schools for the freed slaves' children, begun after the war by the Abolitionists in a small way on the lines of Mr. Washington's noble institution at Tuskegee, which now supplies such a valuable object-lesson for the solution of that vexed question, and merits the support of philanthropists everywhere.

We are too apt to attribute the deliverance of America from the heavy yoke of slavery, bequeathed to it by the founders of the Republic, to the Civil War of 1861-5. That war could never have been carried out to a successful issue, could never even have been undertaken, much less sustained to its triumphant end without the crusade which preceded it, and was waged for more than thirty years by the Abolitionists, led by Garrison and his allies of the "Martyr Age." They had to contend with the Churches which were either silent or openly pro-slavery, and to oppose the mercantile interests which were bound up with the South, and along with the property and standing of the country, defended slavery as the corner-stone of the Republic sanctioned by the Bible.

Sallie Holley was one of the anti-slavery pioneers who thus prepared the way for the success of the Federal army, and enabled Lincoln to proclaim "Liberty throughout all the Land to all the inhabitants thereof," in the words of the inscription on the Liberty Bell of 1776, which is preserved in the old Town Hall of Philadelphia.

Sallie Holley, who lived from 1817 to 1893, was the daughter of Myron Holley, whose name was a variant of that of his seventeenth-century ancestor, Halley, the astronomer. Mr. Chadwick thus describes him:—"Myron Holley was a man who did his own thinking in religious as well as political matters. He was one of a smaller and more despised minority in the former particular than in the latter. He was an exceedingly religious man, but after the way that some call heresy." His daughter Sallie says: "Nothing impressed me more, as I grew up into young womanhood, than my father's earnest religious convictions, ever ardent, alive, and all-controlling. I never knew any soul who had such an unflinching faith in immortality—more like sight than faith, an habitual anticipation of heaven that transfigured all human life to him and dignified every act. He utterly repudiated the popular theology. He thought it unscriptural, irrational and demoralising, and that it deplorably hindered the coming of the kingdom of heaven upon earth. . . . He used to hold a simple service in our home parlour in which the family and the poorer neighbours joined. After his removal to Rochester, New York, he commenced Sunday morning meetings in the Court House, where he preached regularly. There was no Unitarian or other liberal preaching in the city" (where the Rev. W. C. Gannett has now a good congregation).

Miss Holley joined a Unitarian Church in Buffalo in 1841. Six years later she entered on a course of study at Oberlin, the only anti-slavery college in the country. She graduated in 1849, and at the suggestion of Abby Kelley Foster, one of the foremost anti-slavery women lecturers, Miss Holley decided to take up a like vocation. During her stay at Oberlin she formed a friendship with Caroline Putnam, who was in full sympathy with her aspirations, and a source of help and happiness to her henceforth for all her life. They worked together in the anti-slavery cause, and when that was won they carried on a school for the children of the freedmen at Lottsburgh, Virginia, which Miss Putnam continues to the present day. But we must not anticipate in our narrative the time, fourteen years later, when there were freedmen to educate. Those years were passed by Sallie Holley in advocating the cause of the negroes. She was an effective speaker, well equipped for the work, and full of enthusiasm. The path of women lecturers was a thorny one in the early fifties, but Miss Holley was proof against rebuffs, whether theological or merely conventional. She became the accredited agent of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and travelled constantly in that capacity.

"Like the first Christian Apostles," writes Miss Putnam, "we went two, and in humble homes as well as in grand ones, were glad to receive hospitalities. Sometimes in a lonely farmhouse with a table spread with a tin pan of sweet milk, and a corn-meal 'Johnny cake,' as all the house afforded, sleeping in a log house, with one room, but with such good innocent people.—Presto! the scene would change and we be welcomed to the brightest home in every respect—parlour, library, drawing-room, dining-room, music, elegance, superior intelligence, and manners."

Miss Holley's own letters depict this itinerant life.

Sept., 1851.—"You are aware," she writes to a friend and helper in her College days, "that I have entered on my work of A. S. lecturer. My love and interest in the great cause increases and swells and brightens every hour. It does seem to me that, at last, I have found out my sphere."

Parker Pillsbury and Miss Putnam were with her on this occasion. "I am very much pleased with Parker Pillsbury's mind and character, as revealed in our few weeks' acquaintance. So sublimely Christian, so full of mighty faith. . . . Yesterday we rode over to this place. Mr. Pillsbury gave us some very interesting and thrilling passages in his experiences with Stephen Foster, N. P. Rogers, Garrison, and others. How many times Mr. Foster had his coat torn to pieces, was pitched head first downstairs, dragged out of meeting-houses, and shut up in gaols. It all reminds me of the days of Jesus and the Apostles more forcibly than anything I have known in my life."

1852, to Miss Putnam.—"My adventures and experiences as a lecturer are not very dissimilar to ours of last winter. Sometimes the people where I go are extremely warm and cordial—evidently feel it a pleasure and a privilege to entertain the A. S. lecturers. Again, I stay with those who seem to think of us as Topsy did of niggers: 'They arn't nothin' nor nobody.'"

Anecdotes of Emerson and Theodore Parker occur in another letter.

1852.—"Last winter Dr. Stone took tea at Theodore Parker's. Their host related this story to the company:—Years ago Dr. Francis Parkman went over to Lexington, Mass., to hear R. W. Emerson preach. The day after he met George Ripley (of Brook Farm fame), in the street in Boston, and said in a tone of alarm and almost breathless with astonishment: 'Have you heard of the outrage in Lexington—R. W. Emerson?' 'No,' answered Mr. Ripley. 'What outrage has been committed upon R. W. Emerson?' 'Why,' returned Dr. Parkman, 'if you can credit it, Mr. Emerson preached a sermon without taking any text.' 'Well,' said Mr. Ripley, 'I know of a very popular sermon preached by a very popular preacher which had no text.' 'But,' interposed Dr. Parkman, 'Mr. Emerson didn't have any prayer either before or after the sermon.' 'Well,' replied Mr. Ripley, 'if I remember right this popular sermon had no prayer either before or after it was delivered.' 'Why, what sermon do you mean?' said the curious doctor. 'The Sermon on the Mount' was the triumphant answer. Whereupon the doctor was completely silenced and left."

The year 1853 was a significant one for Sallie, writes her biographer. It was marked by the most important of the earlier Woman's Rights Conventions, which met in New York, and was presided over by Lucretia Mott, with the utmost dignity and impressiveness. Miss Holley says:—"I have just come from an admirable speech of the Rev. W. H. Channing's. He closed by saying that the Scandinavians had a fable of a tree that had three roots, and unless these roots were watered by three women the tree could not be kept living and green and beautiful. So said he, our tree of immortal life cannot be fresh and green and living unless its three roots—Home, State, and Church—receive the influence and power of woman."

In 1868, at the suggestion of her friend Miss Emily Howland, who possessed property in Virginia, Miss Putnam had established a school for coloured people—the freed slaves. Two years later Miss Holley joined her life-long friend in this work. She thus describes their enterprise in 1875:—

"It is nearly seven years since we established this Freedmen's School in Virginia. We came here from our great love and pity for the poor coloured people. We are not the agents of any society; we have no salary, but give purely voluntary service. Nothing could be more bare, blank, and hopeless than our material surroundings to begin with. But upon a two-acres' strip of this desolate land, we have succeeded in building a teachers' home and a spacious, airy, pleasant, new school-house. We have made flower borders, strawberry beds, melon patches, grape arbours and fruit trees to blossom and flourish to the admiration of all around us. There are seven hundred coloured people in this town. Our school keeps open from Christmas to Christmas, without vacation, the year round. The tides of its blessing reach every soul. The all-absorbing business of the country is corn-raising. But by keeping the doors of our school ever open, hundreds have learned to read and write. When first we came they did not know a letter of the alphabet, or the names of the days of the week; could not count on ten figures, or name the State they live in. And the ignorance of these white Virginians, too, is appalling—a striking illustration of the truth of what the great Wilberforce said: ‘No man can put a chain around his brother’s neck, and God not put the other end of the chain about his own.’ These slaveholders, in shutting out the light of knowledge from the blacks, also shrouded themselves in the gloom of wretched ignorance.”

Space does not admit of further extracts from Miss Holley’s letters to friends in the North, describing the work at Lottsburgh, and acknowledging their generous contributions towards it.

The many portraits and views with which the book is embellished contribute not a little to its value, and to the perception that while reading it one has been in good company. R. M.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Little Flowers of Saint Francis of Assisi, with eight illustrations by Paul Woodroffe. A short time ago there was no available English translation of the Fioretti. Now we have two. We noticed the appearance of Mr. T. W. Arnold’s admirable version in the Temple Classics some months ago. The translation made by the Franciscan Fathers of Upton, which has been long out of print, has just been reissued in a revised form. It has all the embellishments of print and paper and binding which such a book deserves; and the eight illustrations by Mr. Paul Woodroffe add not a little to the value and charm of the volume. We have been attracted especially by the beautiful plate illustrating St. Francis taming the turtle-doves. We can only advise our readers to buy both translations. Mr. Arnold’s version seems, on the whole, to have the advantage in picturesque simplicity of diction, and in the few passages where we have compared it with the Italian it has also the merit of being more literal. The Fioretti are not in the strict sense of the word history. They form a nosegay, culled from the child-like life of the early Franciscan communities, especially in the March of Ancona. There is no breath from the world of ecclesiastical intrigue and theological strife to mar their peacefulness. Here are men who have seen a great light, and in wonder and love are trying to follow it. You enter with them into the world of miracle and legend, where nothing surprises because God is so real; and through it all you are brought into fellowship with the great and simple soul who breathed new life into the charities, the art and the worship of the Middle Ages. Formal biographies may give exact information upon the details of his career, but here we live in his atmosphere and life becomes simpler and sweeter at the touch of his spirit. The revived interest in St. Francis and Franciscan literature, which has been so marked in recent years, is a most encouraging sign. Men cannot study his life with sympathy and reverence, without gaining some new love for his ideals. (Kegan Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

Neglected Factors in the Study of the Early Progress of Christianity, by the Rev. James Orr, D.D. In the three lectures contained in this volume Professor Orr has treated an important subject with marked success, and we find ourselves in hearty agreement with his general conclusions. He has been impressed by a tendency to emphasise the influence of Paganism upon Christianity during the first three centuries, and the consequent danger of overlooking the original and penetrative power of the Gospel itself. The brilliant work of investigators like Hatch cannot fail to leave the impression of a Christianity gradually yielding to external pressure and conforming to social and ethical standards not its own. But this is only one aspect of the case. We have a distorted historical picture, till we have also clearly in view Paganism slowly yielding to the pressure of Christian influence, modifying its thought and habits in obedience to the standards of the Gospel. In the long struggle the Church won, and it was not after all the conquered who were the real victors. Professor Orr contends that both numerically and socially, and in its penetrative influence upon thought and life, the force of Christianity was much greater than is often supposed. His main positions are:—Firstly, that the spread of Christianity laterally—i.e., in respect of mere numbers, is greater than is ordinarily recognised; secondly, the influence of Christianity on the higher ranks of society has been under-estimated; thirdly, the instreaming of Pagan influences on Christianity has for its counterpart the outstreaming of Christian influences on Pagan society. These positions are supported by much solid learning, the use of the evidence drawn from Christian archaeology being particularly happy. The references to the best literature on the subject are also very full. Altogether the book is a very timely one, and well worthy of appearing some day in a more extended form. (Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

Roman Africa: Archaeological Walks in Algeria and Tunis, by Gaston Boissier. Authorised English version by Arabella Ward. We can heartily commend this pleasant volume to those who went to make a more intimate acquaintance with Roman Africa. It is the work of an enthusiastic archaeologist who has ransacked the remains of an extinct civilisation and makes them tell their own story. The interest is mainly one for the classical student, but some accurate acquaintance with Roman Africa is also essential for understanding the early history of Christianity in the West. It was the country of Tertullian, Cyprian and Augustine; and it produced the earliest Latin version of the Scriptures. M. Gaston Boissier is the writer of a charming French style, as readers of “La Fin du Paganisme” and “La Religion Romaine” will know. In the present case the work of translation has been creditably performed. The meaning is given, but the brightness and the distinction have escaped. There is in the best French prose something elusive which baffles the translator. (G. P. Putnam and Sons. 6s.) W. H. D.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER’S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY SEASIDE HOUSE, SOUTHEND.

SIR,—A house has been purchased, furnished, and conveyed in trust by Mrs. Bayle-Bernard to the London Sunday-school Society, for the purpose of providing a holiday house for the elder scholars attached to our schools.

It will be open, it is hoped, all the year round, so that at times teachers, and perhaps also parents of our scholars, may be received there. The general expenses, exclusive of cost of board, which will be paid by the visitors, will, it is estimated, amount to about £100 per annum. Towards this amount friends have promised nearly £70 for the next three years, and I am sure that others will be glad to help in what should be an immense benefit to many of the young people attached to our schools. Contributions may be forwarded to me at Essex Hall.

The house will be opened the first week in August, and applications have already been received from several schools.

ION PRITCHARD.

SUMMER EXCURSIONS, CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

SIR,—May I through your columns inform intending excursionists of an important mistake in the programme of route.

The train leaving Bâle was given as 7.36, it should be 7.20 A.M. Very little time is given for the excellent breakfast prepared at Bâle.

Our fifty friends arrived, very tired, after an intensely hot and dusty journey, under the guidance of their indefatigable conductors. Only one lady failed to appear at dinner. The lovely situation of the hotel and all the arrangements met with the greatest approval. The flowers in the balconies, the fountain and the little garden above the bustle of the village, give an air of peace and rest, which soon soothed the over-wrought nerves.

In the evening the full-moon rose gradually over the Viescher Horn, illuminating the clouds, and showing up glacier, and precipice, and snow in striking contrast to the dark masses of the mountains.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond’s service on Sunday was most appropriate and solemn, and struck the right key-note for the happy fortnight we hope to have together.

On the evening of arrival the strong choir collected and practised together, so that at the Sunday morning service the sounds of sacred song filled the whole neighbourhood. “A Solemn Calm,” the morning prayer of Mendelssohn, was particularly beautiful and appropriate.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. GEORGE RIDE.

A FAMILIAR figure at the meetings of the Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Assembly will not be seen again, for the Rev. George Ride, for more than thirty years minister at Chorley, has passed away. Mr. Ride was born at Mercaston, near Derby, April 14, 1819, and having been engaged in business, became a student of the Home Missionary Board, when he was over forty years of age. After a year's service at the Chapel-street Domestic Mission in London, he became minister at Chorley in July, 1865, and there remained until his death, although growing infirmities had latterly compelled him to relinquish his ministerial duties. He died at the parsonage, on July 13, being eighty years of age.

Last Sunday evening a funeral sermon was preached at Chorley by the Rev. S. Thompson, of Rivington, who spoke of Mr. Ride as follows:—

From this pulpit week by week he ministered to the spiritual life, and in his daily walk and conversation was an example of faithfulness to his high ideal of duty. His call to the ministry was from God. He gave up a good financial situation in Bury that he might devote himself to the preaching of the Gospel of Christ in truth and freedom. It was a sacrifice demanded of him by the power of conscience, and he paid it joyfully. He saw by the light of the Gospel; his eyes were opened to its truth, and henceforth his great aim was to make others see its beauty and feel its power for good in daily life. We cannot but admire the spirit of whole souled allegiance to truth and duty, to the higher life, to the voice of God as it came to him while engaged in business, which animated him throughout his long ministry. His mind was ever open to the light of new truth. His love of nature was great. The flowers of earth or the stars of heaven were to him alike witnesses of the wisdom and goodness of God. His life was simple and sincere, and he did good as he found opportunity, and approved himself a faithful steward of the talents committed to his care. He was a man of strong will and tenacious purpose; of clear and sound judgment in social, political, and religious questions, a reformer in its best sense, anxious not for party victory, but for the good of humanity. Tender-hearted, sympathetic with those in sorrow or in trouble, he was firm in denouncing cruelty to the lower animals, whose rights he recognised in the light of common justice. As a good citizen he took a lively interest in the affairs of this town, and was ever at work for the cause of temperance. As a man he earned the respect and goodwill of many who differed from him in politics or theology: they recognised the sterling qualities which rank above party and give point to character. He was deeply interested in Unitarian Christianity, and attended all the more important meetings of the denomination with faithful constancy, and rejoiced to see the widening borders of truth that tend to union in the spirit of Christ. He has passed from among us, but his work and influence remain: he has passed from death to life, from cross to crown: he has gone to the great gathering of departed souls to hear the glad-some words, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the Second Part of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress."

Now I saw in my Dream, that they went forward until they were come to the Brow of the Hill, where Piety bethinking herself cried out: Alas! I have forgot what I intended to bestow upon Christiana and her companions. I will go back and fetch it. So she ran and fetched it. While she was gone, Christiana thought she heard, in a grove a little way off on the right hand, a most curious melodious note, with words much like these:

Through all my life thy favour is
So frankly showed to me,
That in thy House for evermore
My dwelling-place shall be.

And listening still she thought she heard another answer it, saying:

For why, the Lord our God is good
His Mercy is for ever sure:
His Truth at all times firmly stood,
And shall from age to age endure.

So Christiana asked Prudence, what 'twas that made those curious notes? They are, said she, our country birds: they sing these notes but seldom except it be at the Spring, when the flowers appear, and the sun shines warm, and then you may hear them all day long. I often, said she, go out to hear them; we also oft-times keep them tame in our House. They are very fine company for us when we are melancholy; also they make the woods, the groves, and solitary places places desirous to be in.

By this time Piety was come again, so she said to Christiana: Look here, I have brought thee a Scheme of all those things that thou hast seen at our House, upon which thou mayest look when thou findest thyself forgetful, and call those things again to remembrance for thy edification and comfort.

Now they began to go down the Hill into the Valley of Humiliation. It was a steep Hill, and the way was slippery; but they were very careful, so they got down pretty well. When they were down in the Valley, Piety said to Christiana: This is the place where Christian, your husband, met with the foul Fiend, Apollyon, and where they had that dreadful fight that they had. I know you cannot but have heard thereof. But be of good courage; so long as you have here Mr. Great-heart to be your guide and conductor, we hope you will fare the better. So when these two had committed the Pilgrims unto the conduct of their guide, he went forward, and they went after.

Then said Mr. Great-heart: We need not be so afraid of this Valley; for here is nothing to hurt us unless we procure it to ourselves. . . . It is the best, the most fruitful, piece of ground in all these parts. It is fat ground, and, as you see, consisteth much in meadows and if a man was to come here in the summer-time as we do now, if he knew not anything before thereof, and if he also delighted himself in the sight of his eyes, he might see that that would be delightful to him. Behold how green this valley is, also how beautified with lilies. I have also known many labouring men that have good estates in this Valley of Humiliation—(for God resisteth the proud, but gives more, more grace to the humble)—for, indeed, it is a very fruitful soil, and doth bring forth by handfuls. Some also have wished that the next way to their Father's House were here, that they might be troubled no more with either hills or mountains to go over; but the way is the way, and there's an end.

Now as they were going along and talking, they espied a Boy feeding his Father's sheep. The boy was in very mean clothes, but of a very fresh and well-favoured countenance, and as he sat by himself he sang. Hark, said Mr. Great-heart, to what the shepherd's boy saith. So they hearkened, and he said:

He that is down, needs fear no fall,
He that is low, no pride:
He that is humble, ever shall Have God to be his guide.

I am content with what I have,
Little be it or much:
And, Lord, contentment still I crave,
Because thou savest such.

Fulness to such a burden is
That go on Pilgrimage:
Here little, and hereafter Bliss,
Is best from age to age.

Then said their Guide: Do you hear him? I will dare to say, that this Boy lives a merrier life, and wears more of that herb called heart's-ease in his bosom, than he that is clad in silk and velvet; but we will proceed in our discourse.

In this Valley our Lord formerly had his country house; he loved much to be here. He loved also to walk these meadows, for he found the air was pleasant. Besides, here a man shall be free from the noise, and from the hurrying of this life. All States are full of noise and confusion, only the Valley of Humiliation is that empty and solitary place. Here a man shall not be so let and hindered in his contemplation, as in other places he is apt to be. This is a Valley that nobody walks in, but those that love a Pilgrim's life. And though Christian had the hard hap to meet here with Apollyon, and to enter with him a brisk encounter, yet I must tell you, that in former times men have met with Angels here, have found Pearls here, and have in this place found the words of Life.

THERE is an immense place for faith in human life, but only for a faith which does not fight against experience: there is a faith in goodness, a faith in progress, in a Supreme Being, in the infinite longings and hopes which rise up in the human breast, which still remain and will remain as long as man exists upon the earth.—B. Jowett.

THE open door to a higher work is contentment with the task at hand, while still keeping in mind the higher ideal. No work will be given to do except that which is needed for moral and social development. We have what we deserve, for the law of action and reaction ultimately means that justice reigns at the heart of things. If we hold the ideal in mind, we may know with absolute surety that the conditions favourable to its realisation will come just at that moment when we are ready—never before—for we can omit no step in evolution.—Horatio Dresser.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A BLACK HERO.

FOUR years ago three African chiefs spent a few days in Liverpool on their way to visit Queen Victoria. The names of the chiefs were Khama, Sebele, and Bathoen. The Lord Mayor of Liverpool invited them to a grand banquet at the Town Hall, and all the guests were struck by the nobility and simplicity of these black princes. Khama had a fine intelligent face, an upright figure, and such a calm nobility that though he was black men said, "he looked every inch a king." His speech was eloquent and impressive; and when translated amazed his hearers; it was so simple and wise, so Christ-like and good. He told them how he was king in Bechuanaland and wished to remain a subject of Queen Victoria, and to prevent traders from bringing intoxicating liquors into his land, because this did his people harm. How came it that this black Khama, who had been brought up in a mud-hut with a heathen father, in the wilds of Africa, could speak so wisely and so well? Let us take a few peeps at his life, and then I think you will agree with me that Khama was a brave, true hero.

Khama was born about 1830. His father, Sekhome, was chief of the principal tribe in Bechuanaland, which lies south of Central Africa. While Khama and his brothers were boys a Lutheran missionary came to Shoshong, where they lived. And although Sekhome was a heathen he liked the missionary so much that he allowed him to teach his sons. Thus Khama was taught about Jesus and to read the Bible in his own language, and before long he was baptised into the Christian Church. To become a Christian was no mere form with this earnest lad, but was the solemn dedication of his life to follow Christ. He really believed the truths which Jesus taught, and faithfully tried to live in the spirit of his great Master.

If we who live in Christian lands find it hard to lead a Christ-like life, how much harder must it have been for Khama to be faithful to his religion in a heathen land! Khama fought bravely against his country's enemies, the fierce Matabele race, but after gaining a victory he would not allow cruelty or plunder, nor would he attend the Bogura or heathen rites with which his people celebrated a victory. His father, Sekhome, ordered him to attend, then begged him, then got angry, and said no son of his should be his heir who would not attend this heathen thanksgiving. Still Khama was firm—he would be faithful to his conscience and his God, even if he lost the kingdom.

When Sekhome found he could not make Khama give up Christianity, he determined to slay him, and took some men to Khama's hut one night, commanding them to kill him while he slept. But the men loved the gentle Khama, and would neither kill him nor allow Sekhome to do so. Before morning all the town had heard of Sekhome's wicked plan, and rose up in favour of Khama, so that the old king fled to the hills in fear of his life.

Khama found out where his father was hiding, and promised to protect him if he would come back to his old position. At first Sekhome was timid, but Khama met him with every mark of respect, and made him king once more. But this generous forgiveness did not really touch the father's heart, and he went on plotting against his son's life. He got some witch-doctors to set fire to Khama's hut one night, and dance around him cursing and shouting out spells of the evil spirits they believed in. Khama got up, and without a murmur patiently put out the fire. Khama's friends now declared that he must resort to witchcraft himself and curse his father, or they could no longer respect him, but he replied, "The Word of God forbids me to curse anyone, least of all my own father." Then the people left him, and to save his life he had to fly to the hills with his family and a few friends.

One day two of Khama's men brought him a horse of Sekhome's they had caught. But Khama rebuked them and reminded them that they were never to attack his father in any way. He made them take the horse back to Sekhome and express his deep regret. Neither Christian nor heathen ever heard Khama speak against his father. After Sekhome's death Khama's younger brother threatened his life, and tried to make himself chief. Khama went to him unattended, saying, "If my brother desires to kill me I had better go alone." Alone he went, and so influenced his brother that there was peace.

When Khama was once established at Shoshong as ruler of the tribe he made a splendid chieftain. He had the wisdom and the courage to make laws for the good of his people, even though they might hate him for interfering with their ancient customs. Thus he forbade witchcraft and banished the witch-doctors, who believed in evil spirits. He put a stop to their cruel customs of treating weak, deformed, or aged persons. He forbade all cruel forms of punishment and made his people treat their servants kindly. Khama saw that the beer his people were so fond of ruined their characters, so he called them together to his courtyard. There he told them plainly that they were utterly degraded by this beer-drinking, and that in future he entirely forbade them either to make it or to drink it. The people thought this unbearable and went away grumbling and threatening to make Khama's brother chief instead of him. Even the missionaries thought he had gone too far in this and remonstrated with the chief, but he replied:—"Beer is the source of all quarrels and disputes, I will stop it." And he did so at the risk of his life.

Then Khama called a meeting of the White men and forbade them to sell drink to his people. Over and over again the Whites tried to introduce drink again, but Khama was firm. In a letter to the Administrator Khama says:—"I dread the White man's drink more than the assegais of the Matabele, which kill men's bodies, and is quickly over; but drink puts devils into men, and destroys both their souls and their bodies. Its wounds never heal. I pray your honour never to ask me to open even a little door to the drink." And when the chiefs came to this country, that was one of the things they cared most about. The Queen received them very graciously at Windsor Castle, and in speaking to them said:—

"I am glad to see the chiefs and to know that they love my rule. I confirm the settlement of their case which my Minister has made. I approve of the provision excluding strong drink from their country. I feel strongly in this matter, and am glad to see that the chiefs have determined to keep so great a curse from the people."

It is very sad to think how much terrible mischief is done by our traders, who against the wishes of the wise natives and the wishes of our Queen, take out strong drink to those countries. But we must honour such a chief as Khama, who sees the evil, and dares to resist it with all his might. And we must hope that before long our people, who are stronger, and ought to be wiser and better than those natives of Africa, will make an end of such a shameful traffic.

A SUMMER AFTERNOON.

My boat drifts idly down the stream
Where through the hills it winds its way,
Singing in every rippling gleam
The glory of the summer day.

Rugged and steep the mountains rise,
Veiled in their mist of chestnut bloom;
And soft the sleeping sunshine lies
Athwart the tufted pine-trees' gloom.

The willows at the water's edge
Are quivering in golden light;
From hidden haunts of matted sedge
A startled heron takes his flight,

Then pauses where the rushes grow.
In this calm spot he fears no snare,
For e'en the woodland creatures know
And trust the Eternal Spirit's care.

It whispers in the passing breeze
And hovers o'er the tangled wood,
Dwelling in rocks and ferns and trees,
Quickening the leafy solitude.

And as the sun moves toward the west,
Sinking beyond the farthest hills,
How distant seems the world's unrest
While Nature's peace my spirit stills!

And so I lay aside all care,
Unmindful of life's storm and stress;
For sunset glow and balmy air
Fold me in living tenderness.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Miss E. F. Lee, £1 1s.; Miss Crowe, 5s.; Mrs. S. Hollins, 10s.; Mr. A. H. Biggs, £3 3s. Miss Lawrence would be very glad if any lady living in the country would kindly volunteer to help in the work of this society by finding cottage homes where the children can be placed at 5s. a week. From several causes many of the cottage homes have fallen off this August, making it hard work for the secretary to get the children suitably placed. Communication should be made to the general secretary, Miss Toye, 156, Stepney-green, London, E.

EPPS'S COCOA ESSENCE.—A THIN COCOA.—The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—James Epps and Co., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

It is not yet a year since the world was astonished, and the friends of peace and humanity filled with a new hope, by the announcement of the proposal of the Tsar of Russia for an International Conference to consider the possibility of an arrest of armaments and the maintenance of peace. And now, in spite of many sceptical prophecies to the contrary, and prognostications of evil, the Conference has met, representing all the civilised nations of the world, and has met, not to exchange idle compliments and empty platitudes, but in a thoroughly serious and business-like manner to deal with the great questions it was summoned to consider.

In May the Conference met at The Hague under the happiest auspices, and its work has this week been accomplished. Not, of course, that the end has been completely gained; the world does not leap in a moment to such great issues; but substantial progress has been made, and as the Conference separates it is with the confidence borne of successful achievement, and with the forward look intent on rendering the steps now taken fruitful of yet further and continuous progress.

It is true that the proposal put in the forefront of the Tsar's Rescript for the arrest and gradual reduction of armaments has been met for the moment by a decided negative, and the nations must continue to bear that crushing burden which in clear and unexaggerated language the Rescript so forcibly described. Yet this subject is not to be lost sight of, for the Conference has expressed the unanimous opinion "that the limitation of military charges, which at present oppress the world, is greatly to be desired for the increase of the material and moral welfare of mankind." When the Tsar's proposal was first made public we said that we had long felt that the nations of Europe must ultimately be driven to refuse the burden of the present destructive military system, but had looked for the first effectual protest to come from the growing forces of democracy. The Conference, while it has brought into prominence the great intricacy and difficulty of the question, has yet given a fresh impulse to the strength of that true aspiration, and it will remain for the people of the most enlightened countries to press home the inquiry, and not to rest until the way opens for realising by steps of practical amelioration the wise and generous impulse of the Tsar.

But while this remains in the future, there are other much more tangible results of the Conference, over which the friends of peace must unfeignedly rejoice. It is no slight achievement to have secured the adaptation to naval warfare of the principles of the Geneva Convention of 1864, which means an extension of the beneficent services of the Red Cross; and there is a further convention to be adopted by the Powers, concerning the laws and customs of war on land, in the interests of non-combatants and the further humanising of the methods of war. But the greatest achievement of the Conference is to be found in the Arbitration Convention, "for the pacific settlement of international disputes." We have the satisfaction of knowing that in this branch of the work of the Conference, Sir JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE, on behalf of Great Britain, took a leading part, and that his scheme for a permanent Tribunal of Arbitration, with suggested amendments from Russia and America, has been practically adopted by the Conference. The decided opposition of Germany prevented the scheme from being fully worked out, as it had been hoped, and appeal to the Tribunal is left optional on the part of the Powers concerned in any dispute; but to have such a means of pacification permanently established is an immense gain. The very existence of such a tribunal, in the maintenance and honour of which all the great Powers will be concerned, will be a silent reproach to any nations that should blindly rush into war without attempting a calmer and more reasonable settlement; and it is provided that when a dispute arises, if the contending parties should show no sign of an intention to refer to the Tribunal, it shall be open to other Powers to make representations, in the direction of mediation, to lead to delay and wiser counsels, and if possible to the settlement of the matter by means of arbitration.

It was, perhaps, too much to hope that anything but the option of arbitration would be accepted by the Conference; yet the establishment of such a permanent tribunal will lay a fresh obligation on all the friends of peace, to use every effort for the strengthening of public opinion in every land, and through the growing force of the people's determination, to insist that whenever the need arises Governments shall make use of arbitration.

"The greatest victory is that by which peace is won"—such, we are told, is the inscription on a scroll amid the decorations of the Orange Hall, where the Conference met, in the House in the Wood. It was a good omen, as the hospitality of the girl Queen of the Netherlands was another. And there is good hope that this "prayer for universal peace," uttered through the steadfast efforts of many faithful men, may indeed avail "the blessed time to expedite."

THE REAL PRESENCE.

NOT here within the page our fingers turn,
While the eye heeds or heeds not as it may,

Is blind or sees, for Love may be away,
Love that alone enables to discern;
Nor there where duly votive tapers burn
Tow'rd heaven, since not at all times in the ray

The soul's ascending ardours take their way,
Nor always fleets the pulse of its concern.

Ah, where then with his presence may we meet?

Holds Earth no spot wherein himself appears?

Lo, he is risen. The passage of his feet
Is heard along the awakening years.
O heart, in this thy craving vex and dim
He rises, and thyself art risen with him.

AMBROSE BENNETT.

In speaking of divine perfection, we mean to say that God is just and true and loving, the author of order and not of disorder, of good and not of evil. Or rather, that He is justice, that He is truth, that He is love, that He is order, that He is the very progress of which we were speaking; and that wherever these qualities are present, whether in the human soul or in the order of Nature, there is God. We might still see Him everywhere, if we had not been mistakenly seeking for Him apart from us, instead of in us; away from the laws of Nature, instead of in them. And we become united to Him not by mystical absorption, but by partaking, whether consciously or unconsciously, of that truth and justice and love which He Himself is. Thus the belief in the immortality of the soul rests at last on the belief in God. If there is a good and wise God, then there is a progress of mankind towards perfection; and if there is no progress of men towards perfection, then there is no good and wise God. We cannot suppose that the moral government of God, of which we see the beginnings in the world and in ourselves, will cease when we pass out of life.—Benjamin Jowett, in the Introduction to his translation of Plato's "Phaedo."

THE PULPIT.

SIXTY YEARS OF A CONGREGATION'S LIFE.*

BY THE REV. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.

"I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance."—2 Peter i. 13.

On the first Sunday of July, 1839—which in that year fell on the 7th—this church was opened for public worship. It is natural, therefore, that to-day, which is almost the sixtieth anniversary of that event, we, the present worshippers in this place, should call to mind the days that are gone, and in the light which they shed on our path gather up the lessons which the experience of two generations supplies. I had hoped to be able to tell you something about the opening of the church, but, strange to say, search and inquiry in all likely quarters have succeeded in bringing to light only one brief published record in a paper called The Sunday Times of Sept. 1, 1839, which reads as follows:—"New Unitarian Chapel, Brixton, Surrey.—This elegant building has been opened for public worship. The style of architecture is the Tudor or domestic Gothic. Dissenting chapels erected in the present day present very different appearances to those built fifty or sixty years ago; indeed, the feeling so prevalent amongst the modern Catholics has extended to the Dissenters, both being determined that the marked difference in outward appearance between churches and chapels which has hitherto existed shall be done away with." And that is all the record has to say! The Church Minute Book states that the service was conducted by the Rev. Thomas Wood (who continued as minister till the close of the following year), and that there was "a very full attendance of Unitarians and others from the neighbourhood of the chapel, but many also from Unitarian congregations in London and at a distance."

Yet the opening of the chapel, which seems to have received so little public notice, must have been a joyous event indeed to some earnest men, who on that seventh of July, after many disappointments, saw the fulfilment of their ardent hopes. Three years before a number of gentlemen met at the Horns Tavern, Kennington. "Unable with their families," they declared, "to go to a distance on the Sunday, (they) are either driven to churches or chapels of a different persuasion, or precluded from attending any place of worship whatever." Thereand then they resolved that it was desirable to build a Unitarian Chapel. Clapham, Brixton, and Camberwell are spoken of as "villages," for whose inhabitants Brixton Church was regarded as the most central position. Accordingly a site was to be sought in that neighbourhood; but although there must have been much vacant land, for a long time none could be obtained for this particular purpose. Some landowners would not listen on any terms to proposals for a Unitarian chapel. In reading the minutes of the many meetings that were held, of the repeated break-down of negotiations, just as they seemed to be reaching a satisfactory conclusion, one cannot but admire the splendid patience and persistency with which those men stuck to their self-imposed task. At a critical point one of the movers, either from weariness or some other cause, wished to back out and to be allowed to pay down one-half his promised subscription, and be done with the whole business, but this only brought up another, who said, for his part, he would rather double his subscription than that the project should fall through. And so in face of a good many tiresome difficulties, but with a faith which never slackened, these men held on through good report and through evil report. And who cannot sympathise with the great joy with which on that summer day, sixty years ago, they would come up, with their families and friends, to worship God in spirit and truth?

It is characteristic of London habits of life that, owing to changes of various kinds, none of the original movers' names should be on our present congregational list, though the family of one of them (Buckler) is still represented among us under another name (Mace). In the quite early days, however, other names still familiar—Martineau, Shakespeare, Withall—are prominent in the records. The personnel of the congregation seems to have changed somewhat rapidly, while the eight ministers, who divide among them the sixty years, have thus had an average of seven and a-half years, if we disregard the considerable interregnums that have occurred.

The period at which the chapel was built was a critical one in our religious history, and, no doubt, explains the peculiar character of the original trust-deed, which I believe is shared by very few other chapels, and which in later years no one would dream of impressing upon any new foundation.

Until the year 1813 any one who denied the doctrine of the Trinity was guilty of a crime punishable by law. Nevertheless, for more than forty years before that, the Trinity had been called in question by men who variously called themselves, or were called by others, Arians, Socinians, or Unitarians. The last became the common designation. The best known of these heretics was Dr. Priestley who, by his ability and character, and also by his scientific eminence, gained much attention for this revolt from the common theology. Priestley began as an orthodox believer, but the same love of fearless investigation, which enabled him to make important scientific discoveries, led to his taking up fresh positions in theology. His love of truth and truthfulness amounted to a passion. First, he parted with the doctrine of original sin, then he looked up the Scripture evidence for the doctrine of the Atonement, and found it insufficient. Afterwards he came to the doctrine of the Trinity, and unable to find it in the Bible, he traced its growth during a later period, and set it down as one of the corruptions of Christianity due to the Church. It is important to remember that Priestley appealed to the Bible as his ultimate authority; that was the basis of his Unitarianism. He did not consider it possible for the Bible to contradict and override reason and conscience, he maintained that they were in harmony with each other, and that if ever it seemed to be otherwise, it was because the language of the Bible had been misunderstood. In defending this position it is possible that Priestley was sometimes led to adopt interpretations, which would hardly be supported by later scholarship.

Such was the general position taken by Priestley, and it led to a great awakening in the Presbyterian congregations spread through the country, which, while always making a manly stand for civil and religious liberty, seem not to have cared much about religious doctrine. They had rather drifted away unconsciously from Orthodoxy than taken hold of anything to put in its place. Priestley's preaching and writing, the example of Lindsey, who gave up the doctrine of the Trinity and, a still rarer thing then as now, gave up also his Yorkshire living and came to London, where he opened Essex-street Chapel—these caused many men and congregations who did not at all love the name Unitarian to value the truth which it represented. While the chapels were still called Presbyterian, the worship and teaching within their walls became Unitarian. It is one of the ironies of history that these solid, respectable people, who were ever found on the side of true patriotism and good citizenship, should as a consequence of their new religious beliefs, be branded by the law as criminals. Yet such they were until the year 1813, when William Smith, M.P. for Norwich, procured the repeal of the law. For many a long year after that the Unitarians had, of course, in common with other Nonconformists, to suffer many civil disabilities.

This brief historical reminder was necessary, in order to understand—I do not say to sympathise with—the position taken by the founders of this and a few other Unitarian chapels. Persecution usually defeats its own object when directed against people with any backbone of character, and it was perhaps not unnatural that those who remembered what Unitarianism had had to bear should insist upon it all the more on that very account. On the other hand, its opponents were showing signs of alarm, and making special efforts to discredit it. In the very year in which this chapel was opened there took place that famous controversy in Liverpool, when three Unitarian ministers (including Dr. Martineau and the late J. Hamilton Thom) had to meet the attack of thirteen clergymen of the Church of England. Moreover, in the course of the thirties, a great danger was looming. Unitarianism was being preached up and down the country in chapels which had been founded, and many of them endowed, by Trinitarians. "A betrayal of trust," cried out the orthodox Nonconformists, who were up in arms against it. "Nothing of the kind," replied the Unitarians; "the chapels were founded with open Trusts, were set apart for the worship of God, and the present occupants, therefore, are the natural, and often the lineal, representatives of the founders." The strife that arose over this question was extremely bitter, and when the Courts of Law decided against the Unitarians, and a large endowment for the support of "poor and godly ministers" left by a certain wealthy Presbyterian, Lady Hewley, in the time of Charles II., was taken away, the alarm became most serious. It seemed as if the Unitarians must lose all their chapels (except the few built since 1813)—chapels in which their fathers for several generations had worshipped, funds which they had left for the support of the services, burial grounds in which they were interred. The indignation and dismay thus produced are strikingly illustrated by a circumstance that has only recently become publicly known.

At that time there was, perhaps, no congregation in our connection more influential than the one which met in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester. It appears that after the verdict in the Lady Hewley suit, several leaders of this congregation—men who were elected to Parliament and the Town Council, men to whom Richard Cobden said he always turned in the first instance when there was any public work to be done—were reduced to such desperation that they were actually arranging to close their businesses, break up their homes, and cross the Atlantic in order to found a colony in Texas! Happily, however, the necessity for this was averted by the intervention of Parliament. Both the great parties in the State recognised the gross injustice which the law, as interpreted in the Lady Hewley case, inflicted upon the Unitarians. They combined to pass the Dissenters' Chapels Act, which provided that, except where a Trust deed has expressly limited the use of a place of worship to persons holding particular religious doctrines, those who have enjoyed it for twenty-five years shall be regarded as its rightful possessors. In commemoration of this great victory, University Hall, in Gordon-square, now known as Dr. Williams's Library, was erected, and in a few years the larger congregations, especially in the North, now secure in their position, built for themselves handsome churches, upon the old open Trusts which had enabled them, in the course of religious development, to pass from Trinitarianism to Unitarianism, and which left them free to welcome any further light that may break forth from God's eternal word, which is unexhausted and inexhaustible.

The Dissenters' Chapels Act was passed in 1844. This was five years after the opening of this chapel, and we can easily understand how the founders shared the sense of insecurity which generally prevailed, and wished to provide against it. In an appeal which they issued to Unitarians for assistance, they tell what steps they propose to take in order that the building "may be preserved free from all invasion by any religious sect whatever." These words are full of significance, when interpreted by the events of the time, and show the anxiety that was felt to avoid the painful uncertainties that were being experienced. It is a matter of rejoicing to us all that a better way is now universally recognised; but these men of 1839, in their wisdom, devoted their chapel to "the public Christian worship of one God, the Father . . . according to the general outline of opinions professed by the Rev. Dr. Joseph Priestley, or more recently by the late Rev. Thomas Belsham." In recent years, as probably you are all aware, this Trust has practically been enlarged in the only way which was legally possible, so that now our Church is, to all intents and purposes, a Free Church, which imposes no doctrinal test whatever on anyone connected with it, and offers a cordial welcome and a religious home to all who desire to join in worshipping God the Father, and cherishing the spirit of Jesus Christ.*

It is impossible, of course, on an occasion like the present to enter into full details of the congregational history; but it seemed appropriate to trace the events which probably account for the peculiarity in our original constitution, which has often been criticised, and to recall how this has subsequently been amended, so as to bring our Church into line with other Churches, in which Unitarianism indeed is generally taught, but which yet are free and unpledged to any particular type of doctrine.

In going through the first Minute Book I have noted some curious entries, which show the changes that time causes in our customs. On one occasion a member suggested the propriety of the congregation standing up during the time of singing, and it was resolved in committee "that the members of the committee individually with their families introduce the practice by standing up in future." With regard to collections, there seems to have been a rooted antipathy, which now we can scarcely understand. An appeal was made on behalf of the London Domestic Mission, but the minister replied that he should object to preach any collection sermon himself. On this point, at any rate, the congregation were entirely at one with their minister, and determined that they also "felt great objection to collections in the chapel for any purpose whatever." They thought highly of the society in question, and would assist it in other ways; but a collection they would not have on any terms. Considerably later, when a day and Sunday-school had been established and required help, the same course was taken; no collection must there be. It is instructive to recall these snatches of history, as showing how questions which arouse much feeling and even conscientious scruple at one time may, after a number of years, be regarded from precisely the opposite point of view. On another matter there has, perhaps, been less change among us in the general idea of propriety, though there has, I think, been some change. During the agitation against the Corn Laws the congregation was requested to petition Parliament in favour of their repeal, but objection was taken to the introduction "of such a subject in such a place" (in words of the Minute), and no step was taken.

In 1854, during the ministry of Dr. Harrison, the congregation had outgrown its accommodation, and the chapel was enlarged by the addition of transepts.

And now, in conclusion, let me remind you, in a single word, that the true significance of all commemorations of the past is to be found in the inspiration derived from them to carry forward into the future all that is noblest and best. Noblesse oblige. From those who have received much, more is expected. Sixty years cannot pass without teaching those who come at the end of the time many things that were hidden from those who lived at the beginning. If our forbears occasionally made mistakes, which there is no excuse for our making, let us not forget to honour and to emulate their zeal and devotion. Their record is closed; ours is still in the making. God grant that it may bear witness that we are a people among whom the spirit of true religion has found a home; that as a Christian brotherhood we sympathise in each other's joys and sorrows; that good-will, charity, and reverence for truth are cherished in our midst.

"ETHICS IN ITS RELATION WITH RELIGION."—I.

BY THE REV. C. B. UPTON, B.A., B.SC.*

ONE of the most striking features of society in the present day, as compared with that of half a century ago, is the apparent serious decline of interest on all questions connected with theology. It can hardly be doubted that not only in our own churches, but also in the churches of the other Christian denominations, many even of the more thoughtful young men and women are no longer so attracted as they used to be by sermons in general, and especially by such sermons as discuss the Unity or Trinity of the Godhead, or attempt to prove from Biblical texts the probable destiny of human souls in the life to come. And, although in these days of widespread scholarship and of the general diffusion of the results of what is called "the Higher Criticism" the Bible is now being much more extensively studied on account of its great worth and interest as being the most precious collection of religious writings which the world possesses, it must, I think, be admitted that in the present day it by no means forms so important and so frequent a factor in our daily home reading as it did half a century ago. And the reason of this is not far to seek. When those of us who are now reaching old age were children, the Bible was regarded as a wholly exceptional book; a unique reverence was paid to it, and a unique importance was attached to it as being in a quite special sense a sort of divine oracle from which was to be derived authentic information concerning God and His relations with men, and also concerning the fate of human souls after death, which information was supposed to be infinitely more reliable and momentous than any which could be reached by the ordinary exercise of man's intellectual and moral faculties. So long as the Bible was so conceived of, it necessarily became an object of intense interest. Wherever, and whenever, it spoke about theology or about human duty, it spoke with a divine authority, and had an intrinsic right to override and to supplant all ideas of God and morality which were founded only on uninspired human reason, and the unaided moral sense of mankind. Hence the work of the preacher in the pulpit, and the teacher in the Sunday-school, proceeded on the assumption that God has two distinct ways of enlightening and guiding mankind; one way is, that he has furnished their souls with a faculty of reason and with a certain power of discerning between right and wrong which we call the moral sense, but that over and above these normal means of arriving at insight into the nature of God, and into the moral conduct of life, He has provided, and duly authenticated by miracle, a really distinct and higher revelation of such a character that it speaks with an authority and a certainty to which the feeble and fluctuating speculations of the unaided intellect and conscience of men can lay no claim.

I remember not long ago reading a short correspondence which passed between the Rev. B. A. Armstrong and the late Cardinal Newman. Cardinal Newman had been denouncing what he called the mischievous tendencies of religious liberalism and Mr. Armstrong had written to ask him what it was in this liberalism which seemed to the Cardinal so dangerous. In a very courteous letter which was received in reply to this, the Cardinal said it was characteristic of this liberalism, that it relied merely on the reason and the moral sense, and that it was inevitable that all religious belief which was erected on these foundations only was doomed to gradual degeneration and must issue at last in Agnosticism and Secularism. The Cardinal accordingly held it essential to the religious well-being of mankind that men should recognise a higher authority than the reason and the moral sense, that rightful authority being, in his view, not only or ultimately the Bible, but the Bible as interpreted by the present and supreme authority of God, as speaking through the official voice of the true Catholic Church.

Now let me call your attention to one very important and fatal result of this position taken up by the Catholic Church, that God has given man two ways of reaching moral and spiritual truth, and that one of these ways has an intrinsic right to carry with it supreme authority. For the purpose which I have in view this morning it is not necessary that I should distinguish between the properly Protestant conception which represents the Bible as the supreme authority, or the Roman Catholic conception (and that of the Romanising Anglican clergy) which makes the Church the supreme authority. You will observe that in both these cases the supreme authority is not found in the voice of God speaking within the human soul, but in the voice of God speaking into the soul from without.

Now I need not remind you how all the bitter persecutions which disfigure the history of the Christian Church have necessarily arisen from this assumed dualism between the voice of God as speaking inwardly in the reason, the conscience and the heart, and the voice of God as speaking from without, through some assumed inspired book or inspired Church. You, my present hearers, may, however, say to me at this stage: This is all very true, no doubt, but we ourselves do not at all recognise such a dualism. We say, with Mr. Armstrong, the final appeal on all questions (whether they be questions of science, of moral duty or of religious belief) is to the natural reason, the natural moral sense, and the natural spiritual discernment of men; and therefore we never teach that any statement in the Bible is true, or that any line of conduct mentioned in the Bible is good and binding, unless it happens to be in accord with what we think reason teaches and our moral sense approves. Now, no doubt, this is to a great extent true; our preachers and teachers do recognise that the supreme authority is God speaking within us, and not, as many of the orthodox still hold, God speaking without us in some external book or Church. The old notion of the Bible as a book composed on entirely different principles from any other book is rapidly dying out with us, and one of the temporary ill effects of its dying out is that the Bible is, I fear, read and studied in our homes, and even in our Sunday-schools, with less frequency, interest and enthusiasm than it was in the days of our fathers and grandfathers.

We have departed from the old view, and have not yet found an adequate or superior substitute for it.

The great defect in the orthodox Christian Church has, I say, been that it has set up an unnatural dualism and opposition between the inner voice of God and an assumed outer voice of God, and has committed the fatal error of making this assumed outer voice of God the supreme or ultimate court of appeal on all matters intellectual, moral, and spiritual. We ourselves have fortunately, to a large extent, got rid of this mischievous dualism; we no longer appeal to an outward revelation as the supreme authority; with us, the cause of our weakness, in so far as it exists both in our Churches and in our Sunday-schools, is that we do sufficiently recognise all the inspiration, light and comfort that is involved in the sublime fact that God is indwelling or immanent in the reason, in the conscience and in the spiritual affections of each one of us; we do not sufficiently realize that if we do not immediately and directly find Him in our reason, in our inner life, in our common emotions of divine sympathy and love, we shall never find Him effectually at all; for God as merely reached by inference, or God as merely believed in in virtue of reliance on Scripture or Tradition, is never adequately apprehended or seen; to be really known God must be directly felt, and the only preachers and teachers who can kindle profound faith and deeply move the heart and actuate the conduct, are not those who try to prove the existence of God, but who by their utterances and by their personal character make their hearers vividly realise the living presence and power of God.

And it seems to me most interesting to notice and remember that this view of God, as immediately revealed in our reason and in our moral ideals, and in the vividness and strength of our unselfish enthusiasm—this view of God as the Father within us manifesting Himself in our consciousness of moral obligation, in all the promptings of our higher nature, and in the consciousness of personal communion with the indwelling Eternal—this is the very view of God which is found in the teachings of Jesus and in the earliest writings of the Christian Church. And this grand doctrine of the immanence of God in Nature, His incarnation in every rational soul, and His immediate self-revelation in every noble heart and mind, in every inspiring book, is the real teaching of Jesus, of the Apostle Paul, and of the writer of the Gospel and the Epistles which are attributed to the Apostle John. All these great religious teachers felt and maintained that God is not a Being who acts upon the world and upon the soul from without, as a watch-maker acts upon a watch, or the husbandman on the soil that he cultivates. God's relation to the world and the soul is more adequately symbolised after the analogy of the vital principle to the organism which it unifies and pervades and animates; but even this relation, intimate and inward as it is, is not so intimate and inward a relationship as that which exists between the Eternal Spirit of the Universe and the human souls which that Spirit calls into existence. Hence in the poem of the Fourth Gospel the Word of God is described as the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world: the Divine Word which illumined with wisdom and love the soul of Jesus is the same Divine Presence which now speaks directly in the mind and heart of every teacher and of every child; and all book-learning is only valuable in so far as it enables the soul to feel with greater vividness and interpret with greater clearness and purity and fulness the direct living utterance of the Father within it. As God, or the Universal Spirit, is directly speaking to the soul in each deliverance of the reason and the conscience, so in every thrill of divine love and affection do we feel the universal life of the indwelling God inspiring us, freeing us from the trammels of selfish desire, and inviting us to become sharers in God's eternal life. Alike in our reason, in our moral ideas, and in our spiritual affections there is a divine or universal element which shows that here there is present not only what is human and belonging to us, but also what is divine, a self-manifestation of the indwelling God.

It is not that God has put something that we call Divine Reason, Divine Righteousness, and Divine Love into our hearts, either at the time of our birth, or in the course of our education. God never gives any of His diviner gifts in any outward fashion, He gives them simply by giving us Himself. When two hearts throb in unison in the divine love, it is not simply that they resemble each other in their essential condition, but rather that the same immanent or indwelling Eternal One is revealing His presence in both, and is thus uniting them together in deepest and most intimate sympathy; and thus all souls in whom divine ideas and divine affections are awakened feel themselves linked together by the most intimate ties, for they are both conscious of the indwelling presence and the indwelling voice of the same Eternal God, and through this common partaking of God's life, they feel the spiritual blessedness of closest friendship and of divinest love. The Apostle truly says that God is Love, and he who loveth is born of God, and knoweth God; but he is very very far from meaning that God is one loving Being, and we are other finite loving beings who are separate from God and outside of God, just as we are in a sense outside of one another. If God were another being like ourselves, but on an infinite scale of magnitude, and so apart from ourselves as we are apart from one another, love would not enable us to know Him; divine love enables us to know Him, because He is directly revealing or manifesting Himself within us, and because in all our divinest, our most self-forgetful, our most self-sacrificing moods and acts, His life manifests itself in our life, and in partaking of that life we feel His divine presence and His divine authority; we know Him because we feel or perceive Him. And this is what Jesus meant when he uttered the memorable words, "the pure in heart do not infer His existence or presence, they are directly conscious of His presence in all the higher and diviner experience of their daily life. We know somewhat of His character, because we know what are the ideas of justice, what are the domestic and social affections, what are the noble philanthropic impulses which arise in us.

because of His indwelling presence. Hence all divinest spiritual truth, all our purest and highest moral ideals, all our aspirations of divine love, all our enthusiasm for humanity never come to us from without, but are always the immediate creation and the immediate inspiration from within; they are always the revelation of God speaking directly to the human mind and heart. Do you call all this mysticism? Perhaps it is; but mysticism of this sort is the vital and dynamic principle in the origination and propagation of every living form of genuine religion, and the teacher who has little or none of this mysticism—the very sensible person who talks about God in the same external and scientific fashion in which he would talk about the evolution of the Animal Kingdom, or the characteristic features of suns and planets—such a teacher, I say, will very soon find that, valuable as he may be as a schoolmaster, he has not that vivid sense of the living presence of God in his own higher life, which is an indispensable condition of all effective spiritual teaching, whether from the pulpit or in the Sunday-school. All created and finite objects are known mediately; all the things in Nature are seen through the mediation of our five or six senses, and of our previous scientific ideas; even our fellow-creatures are known mediately, for it is only through our own senses and through an assumed analogy between them and ourselves, that we get to understand them. God, the uncreated and the Eternal One, is alone known immediately. There can be in the last resort no mediator between Him and us; if we know and see Him at all, we know and see Him directly and immediately. Our moral ideas develop with experience; with growing knowledge and growing sympathies, our ethical insight becomes clearer, and the divine claims of love and duty are seen to embrace a wider circle, and to extend more and more over the whole family of mankind. But nevertheless these moral ideals, be they low or high, be they the sense of duty of a savage, or a Ruskin, a Channing, or a Martineau, all contain some immediate self-revelation of God; and no explanation ever has been given, or ever can be given, why we feel our absolute obligation to do that which we call right, except that in that idea of duty the Absolute and Eternal God reveals Himself within us. In feeling the claims upon us of purity, of righteousness and of divine charity or love, we are conscious of direct contact with God, and in the presence of that felt contact and of that inward Voice we are aware that we are listening to the deliverance of an absolute authority beyond which there is no appeal. This direct contact with the immanent God in our moral consciousness, in our earnest efforts to realise our moral ideal, and in the blissful sense of direct personal communion in our hours of aspiration, devotion and prayer, is now in all civilised society the main basis on which religious belief is founded; and hence all genuine morality includes in it the germs of religious belief, for it involves a consciousness of a divine obligation to respect and obey an inward voice which is felt to be in us but not of our origination, and to have a rightful claim to dispose of our personal lives and of our personal interests. This immediate sense of a divine presence and a divine authority in our inner ideas of what is right and wrong, and in our moral ideals, may widen and deepen and ripen in richly religious souls into a vivid sense of inward communion with the Absolute as with a personal or super-personal Presence, who consciously sympathises with all our trials, responds to our earnest prayers and aspirations, and who works with us and invites our co-operation in all the efforts which aim at converting all human society into a true kingdom of God. All that is deepest and firmest in our religious belief rests, as I have said, on this primitive experience that in our sense of duty, in our consciousness of obligation to do what we feel to be right, there is a Presence and a Voice which though it speaks within our inner life, is nevertheless something higher than—something which transcends our finite personalities, and therefore can never be wholly identified with ourselves. It is a presence within us, yet objective to ourselves, something which is felt to be Absolute, Eternal and Divine.

CO-OPERATION WITH THE DIVINE PURPOSE.

THE sermon preached by the Rev. James Crossley, at the beginning of the sixth year of his ministry at Birkenhead, to which we referred last week, contained the following passage, the text being Isaiah lv. 10, 11:—

The prophet asserts a Divine purpose which moves on to its end without the possibility of failure. The word of God goes forth, it shall accomplish the object for which it was spoken, it shall prosper in the thing whereto it is sent. Here is the statement of a general law, which, I believe, has no exceptions. There is a Divinity which shapes the ultimate results of human life, rough hew or carve them as we will. It operates slowly, appears to have sometimes ceased working altogether. But though men may hinder it for a time, they only delay it; defeat it they cannot. "Through the ages one increasing purpose runs." Through the ages—not merely through a generation or a century. The scale of its operation is so large that men lose sight of it, and think that it does not exist. But the word of God does not return unto Him void. Through hindrances and delays caused by the selfishness, pride, and perversity of men, it persists, unhasting but unrelenting, until it has accomplished its purpose. On the other hand, it may be helped by human agency, and, more important still, it blesses those who move in the line of its advance. It gives grace and glory to those who help to make its movement more rapid. So it happens that in all good work there is an "unearned increment," which is the gift of God over and above the exact return for effort expended. Paul may plant, and Apollos water; "it is God who gives the increase." In working together with God, as in sowing wheat, we do not receive back the precise amount we have sown. There is added something, which is the direct bounty of the Most High. That is the first fact to keep in mind. The word or purpose of the Lord will prosper, whatever we may do or not do. If we throw ourselves into the current of Divine purposes, we are not only carried along more quickly, but there is also satisfaction, joy, abundant reward in the very movement. But if we reap, through the bounty of God, more than we have sown, that sowing is none the less the first condition of reaping at all. If we do not earn the whole increase, we shall get nothing unless we prepare for it by labour and sacrifice. Sacrifice is the cost of progress, the instrument of redemption. No real advance is attainable or possible without it. "The great agent," said Renan, "of the march of the world is pain. There are always voluntary victims ready to serve the end of the universe. And they do not devote themselves in vain." In his essay on Robert Burns, Carlyle says:—"Homer and Socrates and the Christian Apostles belong to old days; but the world's Martyrology was not completed with these. Roger Bacon and Galileo languish in priestly dungeons; Tasso pines in the cell of a madhouse; Camoens dies begging on the streets of Lisbon. So neglected, so persecuted they the prophets, not in Judea only, but in all places where men have been." If any list of authorities were needed to support the statement that sacrifice is the law of progress, it could easily be compiled without going near the theologians. Five hundred years B.C. Euripides exclaimed "that the sons of the gods are destined to be unhappy." And the Greek dramatist points to the class of men from whom the sacrifice is required. They are the men who in any sphere of truth—scientific, moral, religious—shape their conduct only in accordance with their convictions. "They are the men of heroic temper, who love truth with passion, and will speak it somewhat may; who hunger after righteousness, and will do it at all hazards. They are the original men, the discoverers of new truths, the inaugurators of better ways of thinking and acting, the pioneers of beneficial movements, the reformers of evil customs, the enthusiasts of humanity, whose great ambition is to leave the world in some way better than they found it. For them is appointed a hard experience, presenting temptations to suppress their convictions in order to escape trouble and sorrow. Their undying glory is that they do not yield to temptation, and the price they pay for eternal honour is the liability, during their lives, to be misrepresented, misunderstood, frustrated, and persecuted." This sacrifice of the noblest for the uplifting of mankind can easily be used by the pessimist to impugn the moral government of the world. It is so used. But the aim of the pessimist is happiness. The aim of heroes is the good of their kind. And the man who misses happiness, but leaves the world better than he found it, has achieved a nobler destiny than the butterfly existence which flourishes only when the sun shines. Looking, then, at things as they are, and not as we might wish them to be, there is the fact staring us in the face, that progress—for the individual, the Church, the race—is only possible through sacrifice of some kind. The men who are fired with the noble ambition to do something for the world, as well as for themselves, can do it only by subordinating their pleasures, their wishes, to higher ends. That is the great fact which I am anxious to impress upon my younger people especially. It is not a mere assertion of my own. It is writ large on the history and constitution of the universe. No student can miss it. We see this truth most easily and clearly when we look at the lives of the great men who have exemplified it. But it is just as operative on the smallest scale as on the biggest, just as inevitable in our lives and in our Church as in the largest field that history can show. We may leave out, therefore, the further consideration of great men, and ask—Where shall we look for those lovers of their fellow-men who are willing to forego a little happiness, to give up a little pleasure, in order to take a part in the redemption of the world? Surely, we must seek them in the Churches, and surely we ought to find them there. Where shall we turn, if in the Churches there is found no passionate desire for the spread of the Kingdom of God? The Church is nothing if it does not represent and foster the highest and noblest ideals of living. It is a sham if those who compose it are animated with the same motives, and act on the same level as those who make no claim to be religious at all. We shall all, I imagine, be agreed as to the general truth of what I have been saying. The trouble begins when we step down from the general to the particular.

And the sermon ended with a strong plea for loyal service, and the consecration, with a serious sense of duty, of the best gifts to the work of the Church

LET there be many windows in your soul,
That all the glory of the universe
May beautify it. Not the narrow pane
Of one poor creed can catch the radiant rays
That shine from countless sources. Tear away
The blinds of superstition; let the light Pour through fair windows broad as truth itself
And high as God. . . . Tune your ear
To all the wordless music of the stars,
And to the voice of nature, and your heart
Shall turn to truth and goodness, as the

And all the forces of the firmament
Shall fortify your strength. Be not

“THE best way to help another is by suggesting something that will take him out of self.”—Journal of Practical Metaphysics.

IF you are tempted as you look on the poverty and meanness of human life, on the vulgar aims and poor ambitions, and sordid cares and selfish indulgences, which make up the life of so many of us, to think meanly of human nature, and to ask whether a future of ideal perfection for such beings is not a dream of romance, the answer of Christianity is, “Know what humanity is capable of by what it has actually become. Learn from the height of moral elevation it has actually attained, what by its very make and structure is God’s design for it, the true birthright of humanity which in our moral sloth and selfishness we are renouncing, and which all, the least and lowest of us, may hope to regain.”—Dr Caird, University Sermons.

UNDER THE RED EAGLE.—I.

DURING many long sojourns under the shadow of the Red Eagle of Tirol I have learnt to regard that bird with both respect and affection. I rejoice in his uncanny shape, his gigantic claws and beak, widespread wings, and lively hue. In the national song he frankly answers the question, “Adler, Tiroler Adler, warum bist du so roth?” to this effect:—He is red because he sits on the sun-red mountain peaks, because he tastes the red Etschland wine, because he is dipped in the blood of the enemy. If you think that last touch too grim remember 1809, when the national hero, Andreas Hofer, withstood with his peasant army the great forces of France and Bavaria:—

Beneath this God-like warrior, see!
Hills, torrents, woods embodied to bemock
The Tyrant and confound his cruelty.

All through Tirol—through German speaking Tirol at least—the memory of Andreas Hofer is cherished. In Innsbruck, perhaps more than in any other one place, memorials of him abound. How pleasant a day in Innsbruck can be! You leave your hotel in the station square and make your way to the Maria-Theresien Strasse. What other city can look up to such a range of limestone mountains? They seem to overhang the street, and, except in the height of summer, they are crowned with snow. So strong is the charm of out-of-doors in Innsbruck, that it seems best to defer even the Hofkirche for half an hour and breathe the air in the Hofgarten beyond the palace and the theatre. There, on a spring morning, the mountains shine down through a light veil of budding beech trees and leafy chestnuts. There is no smooth turf, but rough grass bubbling over with common spring flowers. There are also beds gay with garden flowers, and an Alpine rockery. But always the mountains dominate the whole; the eye turns to them first and last.

It is strange to pass from the fresh warmth of the Hofgarten to the tempered light and the coolness of the Franciscan church. Here are a strange array of colossal bronze figures ranged on each side of a stately railed-in tomb. On the tomb kneels a majestic bronze figure of the Emperor Maximilian I. His monument—for it is not his actual tomb, that is at Wiener-Neustadt—is impressive as befits that most impressive character. “The last of the knights,” as he has been called, brings the old chivalry, the old social order to a close. He loved the old poetry, the old chronicles; he was a great patron of art, a great hunter. He loved pageants, and surely a grand pageant is here. He ordered it himself, and a Court painter designed it, and it took many years to complete. The monument itself bears, beside the grand figure above, twenty-four exquisite white marble reliefs telling the story of Maximilian’s life. But most striking, perhaps, are those silent bronze watchers of the tomb, some grotesque, but all powerful, and two of exceeding beauty attributed to Peter Vischer of Nuremberg. These are Arthur of England and Theodoric the Goth, or, in the language of poetry, Dietrich of Bern (Verona). They alone have not their hands fixed to carry torches. There also are Clovis, and Godfrey de Bouillon with the crown of thorns. Great potentates and noble ladies stand side by side watching night and day the kneeling Emperor.

There is another monument in the church—of white marble, not too finely sculptured—of a man in peasant’s dress holding a flag. Concerning this, F. W. Robertson (of Brighton) writes in 1846: “It represents Hofer in Tyrolese costume, with his rifle, decorations, and a standard in his hand, crowned with laurel by the Goddess of Victory. But the Court of Austria, in their aristocratic littleness, considered this part of the design too flattering to a peasant; and the monument stands now without the crown and goddess. As if God had not stamped upon Hofer’s brow and heart a nobility of which crowns and titles are but the earthly shadow. The nobles of Austria will have their memory with the worms that eat them when Hofer’s name is still high among the aristocracy of the universe.” Indeed, Hofer’s monument may be said to be Tirol, and his memory is enshrined in the pathetic song “Zu Mantua in Banden,” which records his martyrdom. Probably the Goddess of Victory was an ugly figure, and can well be dispensed with.

Before leaving the Hofkirche there is one tomb more to see; it is up some steps in a little shut-away chapel, called the silver chapel from a silver statue of Madonna that is enshrined there. It is the tomb of Philippine Welser, and it recalls one of the pleasantest romances of real life, and one of the sweetest of women. The daughter of a burgher of Augsburg, of wonderful beauty and wisdom, she attracted the devotion of Archduke Ferdinand, and, in spite of all the world, they were betrothed. The world, however, kept them apart for nine years. Philippine was thirty when at last her lover’s father succeeded to the Imperial dignity as Ferdinand I. Then a secret marriage was allowed, only to be acknowledged some years later, when Philippine took her place as the Archduke’s lawful wife. He at this time was Governor of Bohemia, and installed his bride in the royal castle of Břeglitz. Now Philippine happened to hear that in a windowless subterranean dungeon of that castle there had been shut up for fourteen years a certain bishop of the United Brethren, named Johann Augusta, and though she had no taint of heresy, yet being “a lover of all sad souls,” she gave her husband no peace till he allowed her to visit the unfortunate schismatic. Here I quote from an essay by Mr. Marion Crawford:—“The prisoner told her that during the last eight years of his confinement he and his fellow-sufferer, Jacob Bilek, had neither seen light nor breathed fresh air; he implored his visitor to obtain for him permission to spend Easter Day in daylight. This was allowed to him and to his companion through Philippine’s intercession, and in a short time she prevailed upon Ferdinand to set them both at liberty.”

Near the tombs of Philippine and her husband an old organ stands. It is said to have been the gift of that mighty man of war, Pope Julius II. “Out of the strong came forth sweetness”; for its tones are peculiarly soft and mellow.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Crewkerne.—The new school-room added to the Hermitage-street Chapel was opened on the afternoon of Thursday, July 20, by Mr. William Blake, of Bridge. Among those who were present were the Revs. Dr. Brooke Herford, J. Worthington, F. W. Stanley, H. S. Solly, T. B. Broadrick, S. S. Brettell (minister of the chapel), Messrs. R. Blake, E. J. Blake, W. Colfox, T. A. Colfox, and a large number of other friends from Bridport, Ilminster, and Taunton. The need of the school-room had long been felt, and Mr. E. J. Blake having given the necessary land, the congregation built the room at a cost of £260. It is built of brick, with a span roof, and measures 35ft. by 18ft. inside. The floor is of wooden blocks, and ornamental incandescent gas brackets have been erected. Mr. Blake having declared the room open, a vote of thanks to him was moved by the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, and seconded by the Rev. S. S. Brettell. Service was afterwards held in the chapel, conducted by Dr. Brooke Herford, who urged his hearers to persevere in carrying on the work of the Sunday-school. After tea in the school-room, a public meeting was held, the chair being taken by Mr. E. J. Blake, who mentioned that the first Sunday-school in connection with that chapel was opened in 1790. A vote of thanks to Dr. Herford for his sermon was moved by the Rev. J. Worthington, and seconded by the Rev. H. S. Solly. Encouraging addresses were also given by the Revs. F. W. Stanley and Edward Parry, and thanks to all helpers was given on the motion of Mr. T. A. Colfox, seconded by Mr. G. Philpott, Mr. T. Stembbridge responding. The collections during the day amounted to £9 11s., and all expenses having been met, the Chairman suggested that the balance should form the beginning of a fund for reseating the chapel.

Glasgow (resignation).—The Rev. A. Lizenby has concluded his ministry at St. Vincent street, after fourteen years of service.

Gloucester.—The annual excursion of the choir and congregation took place on Monday to Symond's Yat, on the Wye. A more delightful resort could not have been chosen, and young and old alike found great enjoyment, in the lovely scenery of this celebrated spot, in climbing to the top of the Yat, and boating and rambling by the side of the loveliest of English streams. The party was accompanied by the Rev. W. Lloyd and Mr. A. Keeping, choir-master. It has been decided to start a Burton-street Chapel Bi-centenary Fund for the extinction of the debt incurred by the extensive improvements, &c., which were carried out about five years ago. The congregation will do their best, and the effort will culminate in a bazaar to be held in the autumn. Full particulars will shortly be advertised.

Lancaster.—The School Board election has resulted in the return of the five Progressives, who are thus again the majority of the Board. A Roman Catholic and ex-Mayor heads the poll, followed by two Churchmen, and then comes our minister, the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, who has the honour of being the first of the Progressive five.

Leeds: Mill-hill.—The prizes obtained by the scholars connected with the Mill-hill Sunday-school (upwards of eighty in number), in the recent examination, under the auspices of the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union, were presented by Mr. Councillor J. D. Conyers, of Bramley, near Leeds, and for many years secretary of the Mill-hill Sunday-school. The Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., occupied the chair, and he was supported by the superintendents and teachers of the school. Councillor Conyers, in the course of an interesting and thoroughly practical address, expressed his high appreciation of the honour conferred upon him in selecting him to perform that pleasing duty. Having alluded to his long and pleasant connection with the school as a teacher, he impressed upon the scholars the great necessity which existed for punctual and regular attendance, obedience to their teachers, and earnest attention to the instruction imparted, for he was of opinion that in the Sunday-school the foundation of a good character and useful life was laid. At the close Mr. Frederick Clayton proposed, and Mr. W. H. F. Ferro seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Conyers, singing and prayer concluding the proceedings.

London: Islington.—The sixth annual show of plants, cultivated by the scholars of Unity Church Sunday-school, was held on Tuesday, July 18. Seventy-three plants were brought in for competition, the condition of which showed that great care had been taken of them during the time they had been in the possession of the scholars. Eleven prizes were given. At the evening meeting, over which the Rev. Dr. Hicks presided, the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Bartram, who, in a short but interesting speech, impressed her hearers with the benefits and pleasures that could be derived from the cultivation of window plants. An address was then delivered by Mrs. Farrington (of Richmond), who pointed out that beauty existed in wild as well as in cultivated flowers, and that both kinds were intended to be of benefit to mankind. During the evening vocal and instrumental music was performed. The summer excursion took place on Tuesday, July 11, when the scholars were taken in brakes to South Mimms, and a very pleasant day was spent.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission.—On Tuesday, July 18, some forty or fifty teachers and elder scholars assembled to hear an account of the summer meeting recently held at Oxford. The five teachers who attended had divided the period between them and were thus enabled to give reports of the papers, &c., with some degree of fulness. In order that those present might enjoy the sights of the University City, a set of slides (augmented by a few specially prepared of Manchester College) were passed through the lantern and briefly described. A profitable and enjoyable evening was passed and some of the enthusiasm roused by the Oxford gathering was imparted to those who had not been able to attend. On Tuesday last (25th inst.) in the schoolroom the fifteenth annual flower show was held. Of the 265 plants sold to children and adults in April last, only 103 were brought in for show. The plants, as in former years, were judged by Mr. J. Weston, gardener of Mr. D. Martineau. The favourite plants were geraniums and fuchsias, and most of those exhibited were extremely creditable. At 8.30 p.m. the chair was taken by Mr. S. W. Preston, who, after a short address to the assembled exhibitors, introduced Miss Edith Preston who distributed the twenty-three prizes. One of these was awarded to the child who had gathered the best bunch of wild flowers at the annual excursion, and another was for the best drawing of a flower from a copy. Thanks are due to Miss Garrett and Mrs. Cadman for purchasing prizes, and to Mr. Clark and Miss Hutchinson for music during the evening.

London: Welsh Services.—The attendance at the services at Essex Hall has been exceptionally good during the last few weeks, but during the holiday season, while some of the workers are out of town, it has been thought well to suspend the services. Mr. Delta Evans gave the closing address of the session last Sunday evening, speaking from Galatians vi. 9. It has been unanimously decided by the promoters of this movement to furnish a Welsh stall for the London Bazaar next year, and they appeal to friends throughout the Principality to help them in making their stall worthy of the occasion. Offers of help may be sent to the hon. sec. of the movement at Essex Hall.

Trowbridge (appointment).—The Rev. Joseph Wain, of Lewins Mead Mission, Bristol, has accepted the pastorate of Conigre Chapel, vacated by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, now of Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney.

The following communication has been sent to the Duke of Devonshire as chief of the Education Department, signed by the following officers of the National Council:—Alexander Mackennal (President), John Clifford (ex-President), J. Monro Gibson (hon. secretary), Evan Spicer (treasurer), Thomas Law (organising secretary):

We have been informed that the School Board for Liverpool has taken a religious Catechism prepared by a committee of the Free Church Council, and made a few alterations in it so that the Catechism may be used for the purpose of religious instruction in the public elementary schools within their jurisdiction, and that application has been made to the Education Department for such use of the Catechism.

We wish to inform your Grace that the Liverpool School Board has been in this matter acting without our concurrence and entirely against our wishes in putting our Catechism to such a use.

The Catechism was prepared by our committee for use in the Evangelical Free Churches of the country, and we look on the action of the Liverpool School Board as a direct and most reprehensible violation of those clauses of the Education Act which forbid the use of doctrinal and denominational formulæ in Board schools.

We therefore wish to express to your Grace our strong disapprobation of the action of the action of the Liverpool School Board, and our intention to offer it our strenuous resistance.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

On the eve of Bank Holiday, one must hope that the unbroken summer weather of the past weeks may stay a few days longer ; and yet one would delight now to stand for six hours in a steady down-pour of friendly rain ! If only it is not so tempestuous as to beat down the corn or do other damage, how the country would rejoice, and the hidden springs of the earth laugh for joy. The hill-sides would send down messages of deliverance to the rivers, and the water companies, if they have any conscience, would breathe again.

The Archbishop of Canterbury on Monday delivered his judgment on the lawfulness of the liturgical use of incense and the lawfulness of carrying lights in processions in public worship of the Church of England. Both practices are unequivocally condemned as contrary to the law. Incense may be used for purposes of fumigation, if desired, “to sweeten churches,” as it was used by George Herbert, but not for ceremonial purposes. The judgment is a blow to the High Churchmen who value the use of incense as a visible and outward sign of the continuity of the Catholic Church in England, but it will be difficult for them to refuse obedience, since they profess to desire spiritual authority to rule in the Church, and despise the secular courts, which could enforce a law, as the Archbishop cannot. The Guardian urges obedience, and Dr. Cobb, curate-in-charge of St. Ethelburga, Bishopsgate Within, while regretting that the law should be so, says that it must be obeyed, but there must be agitation for a better law. On the other hand, the Rev. A. W. Jephson, of St. John's, Walworth, a member of the London School Board, considers the whole discussion contemptible and sheer waste of time, which would have been better spent in efforts to improve the housing of the people and the sanitation of poor districts.

THE twenty-first anniversary of the founding of Dr. Williams's Endowed School for Girls at Dolgelly was celebrated on Tuesday, July 25, when a representative gathering of the friends of higher education in Wales took part in the proceedings, and of the thousand or so “old girls” over two hundred came from far and near to join in the congratulations and good wishes for the future. The present headmistress, Miss Diana Thomas, B.A., Miss Armstrong, the first headmistress, Principal Reichal, Mr. Hobhouse, M.P., Lady Verney, the Bishop of Bangor, and the Rev. F. H. Jones, of Dr. Williams's Library, were among the speakers. The chair was taken by Mrs. Holland, of Caerleon. The Welsh Gazette of July 27 gives an interesting account of the celebrations and of the history of Dr. Williams's Trust, under which the school was established, and has had so prosperous a career.

THE Manchester Herald of July 29 contains an article on “An Ancient Chapel Yard,” by the Rev. G. A. Payne, giving some interesting notes of the history of Knutsford Chapel, and a description of some of the graves. After referring to one of his predecessors, the Rev. Henry Green, M.A., who was minister of the chapel 1827 to 1872, Mr. Payne concludes :—

But there is one grave I have not mentioned, which is the most frequented of all. It is marked by a simple stone cross, under which lie the mortal remains of

Here the visitor to Cranford, the lovers and admirers of the works of the gifted authoress, the friends of the saintly man whose memory lives in many minds to-day, all unite in paying homage to the shrine of a noble pair of workers in God's vineyard.

The ancient graveyard hallowed by sacred associations still bears its silent testimony to the worth of many noble souls who have brought sunshine and gladness into the hearts of the living, and who “live again in minds made nobler by their presence.”

THE Hon. Stephen Coleridge, on behalf of the National Anti-Vivisection Society, has addressed the following note to the public press :—

“In his answer to Mr. Paulton's questions in the House of Commons last night (July 24) on the working of the Vivisection Act, the Home Secretary stated, according to the Times' report, that he limited the number of experiments under one certificate ‘in the case of serious experiments in which the use of anæsthetics is wholly or partly dispensed with.’ From this reply we learn without circumlocution and on the highest possible authority, that serious experiments are performed in which the use of anæsthetics is wholly dispensed with. The Government Inspector in his yearly report says :— ‘The only experiments performed without anæsthetics are of the nature of inoculations or hypodermic injections.’ This statement made every year by the Inspector has now at last received a flat contradiction from the Home Secretary, and let us hope that the public will no longer be content to believe that Vivisection, as practised in this country, involves no torture of animals.”

THE following minute was adopted by the Liberation Society's Committee on Monday :—“1. In renewing their emphatic protest against the Bill for paying out of the local taxation account half of the parochial rates now payable by the clerical receivers of tithe rent charge—estimated at £87,000 per annum—the Committee recognise not only that the measure has been generally condemned by public opinion, but that its injustice has been exposed in Parliament, where it has been feebly defended, and has been supported by diminishing majorities. 2. In the opinion of the Committee the pecuniary necessities of the Anglican clergy should be met by the liberality of those who attend the services of the Established Church. Or if, while the Church continues to be established, recourse is had to national funds, the large revenues controlled by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty * should be applied for the purpose, thereby avoiding an increase of the burden already resting on ratepayers. 3. The granting of an additional State endowment to a Church already in possession of an immense amount of National property, and on grounds which may hereafter be held to justify further subsidies, furnishes, in the opinion of the Committee, a fresh incentive to effort on the part of those who regard the Disestablishment of the Church as the only effectual means of guarding the public against unjust exactions, as well as invidious ecclesiastical distinctions. 4. Having regard to the fact that the measure will expire with the Agricultural Rates Act in 1902, the Committee will take steps for preventing its renewal by diffusing information respecting it in every locality in the country.” [* The Ecclesiastical Commissioners alone have had during the three last years surpluses

THE meetings of the Wesleyan Conference were concluded on Wednesday, when among the business transacted was the almost unanimous adoption of the following further resolutions on the subject of temperance reform:—

1.—The conference reaffirms its resolutions of last year, namely:—

(i) The conference was never more alive than at the present time to the dire results of the liquor traffic, and rejoices in the progress of temperance sentiment and practice in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, but feels that to interfere with the constitutional method of appointing our Church officers is undesirable, in the interests of temperance work itself, as well as on other grounds.

(ii) At the same time, the conference recommends our people to keep themselves free from complicity with a traffic the results of which are so injurious to the interests of religion, morality, and social life.

2.—The conference deeply deplores the manifold evils—spiritual, moral, and physical—arising from the existing liquor traffic, and confidently relies on the continued growth of moral conviction in the community, by the blessing of God, to remove the present national disgrace and danger. It once more earnestly exhorts our people to keep themselves free from complicity with the traffic, and to give their active support to all well-considered efforts on behalf of temperance reform.

3.—The conference cannot, however, impose disabilities upon those who sell drink which would not apply to those who buy and use it; neither is it prepared to interfere with the rights and responsibilities of local authorities in the election of Church officers.

4.—Furthermore, the conference believes that the great ends of the temperance movement can be secured without resort to methods of coercion which raise the gravest issues respecting the constitution of the Christian Church, and the rights of the individual Christian conscience.

At the last yearly meeting of the Society of Friends a memorandum from the Lancashire and Cheshire Quarterly Meeting was read, on "The Conditions of Right Development and Effective Exercise of the Ministry." The memorandum expresses the desire that ministry may be "heart-searching and converting, full of freshness and power, able to inspire with noble ideals, to help the struggling soul into the peace of God, to comfort the weary, to teach the new duties that the new age brings," and it is so rich in wisdom and clear discernment that we thankfully quote a few of its most helpful passages.

"It is not great powers of thought or of language, but experience of the things of God, that forms the chief condition of receiving a call to the ministry.

"More important than the actual words used is the atmosphere the speaker brings with him—the evidence, which his hearers instinctively discern, that he is speaking of what he knows. It is as he habitually abides in Christ, as it is his "meat and drink" to know and do his Master's will, that he can make the love of Christ real to those who hear.

"If there has been an unmistakable call to take up the work of the ministry, and if there is constant dependence on the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the minister will do well, to "give himself to his ministering"—to consecrate to it his best powers of mind and body as well as soul. There is an urgent need in our Society that, subject always to right guidance, more thought and study should be devoted to the work of the ministry, and that for this study leisure should be found or made.

"The right development of ministry depends largely upon the congregation as well as upon the individual. The best ministry is often a tender plant, easily cut by the cold breath of unloving criticism, but expanding in the genial warmth of sympathetic souls. Ministers whose services are felt to be helpful to the congregation should not be allowed to rest under a sense of discouragement, for want of a word of appreciative sympathy. The collective body must strive to keep before its younger members the responsibility that our system of free ministry lays upon them for filling up the ranks, and keeping the ministry in touch with the needs of the day.

"We should be far indeed from suggesting that those who have had few opportunities for acquiring knowledge should be excluded from the work of the ministry. In our system there is a place for all; and those who have had few outward advantages can, under the Divine prompting, often speak to needs that a more cultured ministry fails to meet. But there is among us a large and un-increasing number of those who may be called the strong—whose inner conflict is with foes not moral only but intellectual—who need all the help that can be given by the wide vision and sympathetic insight of ministers who have thought deeply as well as felt deeply of the things of God.

"Lastly, ministry is likely to be effective as it is felt to be not a duty only but a glorious privilege to be made co-workers with God in His mighty work of redeeming and educating the wandering sons of men. All earnest wrestling for souls is part of a greater and victorious conflict; it is the high honour of the servants of Christ to be allowed to know "the fellowship of His sufferings." And it will be to them the chief joy of life when they are permitted by Him to "draw water out of the wells of salvation," and to hand it, in His name, to the thirsty lips of His little ones."

THE yearly meeting of the Society of Friends having issued a letter "On Ministry and Oversight upon Worship and Ministry," the Editor of the British Friend received a letter from a lady correspondent which he was glad to be allowed to publish in the current number of his paper, and which we are glad here to reprint. The letter is as follows:—

"Dear Mr. Turner,—Thank you much for the beautiful yearly meeting letter. Its pages are full of help and suggestion for the deepening of the spiritual life of anyone who reads it. I should think the letter and the meeting that called it forth will have a far-reaching influence for good. It breaks one's ideal of your society to hear that even among Friends silence may sometimes be dead instead of living, and that such enemies of worship as 'routine,' or 'selfish enjoyment,' can creep even into your meeting-houses! But our common frailty and needs show a common brotherhood.

"Since reading the reports of your Dublin and London meetings I have often been led to think out what are the strong and what the weak points of our public worship as well as of yours.

"We certainly have some dangers in a professional ministry, and you have a great strength in the absence of it, and in the responsibility laid on all, and especially in the silent 'waiting on the Lord.'

"Still it has been a great help to our body that we have always had at any rate a small proportion of men who have given special study to theological subjects, as well as cultivating the religious spirit.

"These men have been able to meet the special difficulties of a scientific and materialistic age, and (in spite of fears expressed by many friends to the contrary) those who have studied most deeply are usually the most spiritual and humble-minded.

"Of course culture of the mind can never make a minister and is not a necessity in any way, but where it can be had it should help any man or woman to be a more valuable instrument in the hand of God. It is not likely that George Fox excluded intellectual gifts when he wrote to all friends in the ministry everywhere, 'Stir up the gift of God in you and improve it.' So, in urging the use and dedication of all powers this letter is only going back to the leader.

"Did you see an address by Mr. Hargrove stating that the question of culture for the ministry depends on whether or no Theology is accounted a science? That if, as modern philosophers hold, Theology is not only the most real science, but the 'Queen of sciences' under whose rule all the other sciences find their place and due relation, then it is surely worthy to be studied by those whom God has called to help the spiritual life of the world. To give all the attention to the physical forces of which our planet is the result, and neglect those moral forces whose outcome is civilised man, is to prefer the lower before the higher, to value the dwelling place above the dwellers in it. Knowledge of God and of His relations with man should be the supreme study of mankind, and nothing which can illustrate either the perfection of God, or the nature, capacity, and history of man, can be alien to it, or entirely unimportant."

THE death is announced of Mrs. Vaughan, widow of the late Dean of Llandaff, formerly Headmaster of Harrow, and for many years Master of the Temple. Mrs. Vaughan was a daughter of Dr. Stanley, Bishop of Norwich, and a sister of Dean Stanley.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Holly Hill Guild, £4; H. K., 10s.; Mrs. Hands, Scarborough, £1 1s.; Mrs. Paget, 10s.; Miss Tennant, 10s. and a parcel of clothing; Miss Gibb, 5s.

'THE PRACTICE OF QUIETNESS.'

THIS excellent little book, though no longer known except to the book-hunter, was for several generations regarded as a classic in theological literature. Its popularity is attested by the number of editions (nine or more) through which it passed. After a perusal, one realises the reason. The book is written with a fixed purpose, in plain language, so as to be understood of the people.

Its author was George Webb, who at the time of his death was Bishop of Limerick—not the only point of analogy between him and the more celebrated author of "Holy Living" and "Holy Dying." Though less original and less eloquent than that of the Bishop of Down and Connor, Webb's work is written in forcible English prose, racy of the times when Queen Bess "tuned her pulpits," and the Most High and Mighty Prince James caused the Bible to be translated anew.

Of Webb himself we can here only say that he was a Wiltshire man, born in 1581; graduated at Oxford; entered Holy Orders, and—probably through the interest of the Earl of Pembroke—became Chaplain-in-Ordinary to King Charles I., whose first child he baptised. In 1634 he was made Bishop of Limerick, and died in 1641. The circumstances attending the demise of the author of "The Practice of Quietness" afford an instance of the occasional irony of fate. He was at the time a captive in Limerick Castle, in the hands of the rebels, by whom the body, soon after interment, was rudely dug up in the hope of plunder. It is something to learn that the spoilers being "frustrated," "reposed the body in the same place."

But though his passing was stormy, George Webb was fortunate in having run his course before the terrible civil wars had reached their climax; and the main portion of his career was passed in tranquillity. During the reign of the monarch whose motto was "Beati pacifici," the surface of affairs, at least, was serene, however busy the volcano may have been underground. The Bishop is able to paint the following almost idyllic picture of his country, as it then appeared:—

It is not a common blessing which we of this Island at this day enjoy, in that we are free from wars, and enjoy a common quietness. . . . We know not how cruel an enemy is, nor how burthensome war is. Look we round about us: all our neighbours have seen and tasted these calamities; only this Island, our Britain, our dear country, like the centre, standeth immovable, whilst all the rest of the world hath been whirled about in these tumultuous broils. We have peace abroad, and peace at home. Men may travel safely at home, merchants traffick without danger abroad: artificers may sing in their shops; husbandmen may cheerfully follow the plough; students comfortably apply their books; all which things by War are interrupted.

Webb had, moreover, other things to be thankful for, as he duly acknowledges. His domestic life was happy: he was blessed with a good wife. While treating of the misery of ill-assorted matches, he is able to exclaim, "Blessed be God, I cannot descry it by any feeling experience of mine own, for my beloved is mine and I am hers; but I have often heard the complaint of it in other houses."

A considerable portion of his leisure seems to have been given to literary pursuits, chiefly of a theological nature.

Among other fruits of his pen were "A Brief Exposition of the Principles of the Christian Religion" (published in 1612); "The Arraignment of an Unruly Tongue" (1619); "Catalogus Protestantium;" or, The Protestants' Calendar, containing a survey of the Christian Religion long before Luther's days" (1624); and several occasional sermons. Nor did he confine himself to sacred letters. He published translations of two of Terence's comedies, and some educational books in the Latin tongue.

One has only to dip into "The Practice of Quietness" to be convinced that its writer was well read in the classics, especially the Latin; as well as in the Fathers of the Church. The book teems with classic anecdotes, fables, and quotations, while Augustine, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Bernard are freely quoted.

But the main structure of the little book consists of passages from Holy Writ. Except indeed for certain hiati (as one might almost call them) in which the original thought of the compiler has a chance of showing itself, the book is built or woven of texts. In days which knew not Cruden, the labour involved in marshalling so vast a body of texts, so as to subserve the main purpose of a book, must have been immense. The success with which the task has been performed is a high tribute alike to the skill and to the erudition of the author. Often enough, it is true, we can see how fondness for some fine text has led him to deviate from the thread of his discourse, but, generally speaking, the quotations are apt and felicitous, and illustrate rather than obscure his meaning. Illustration was, however, less the writer's object than authority. The book, indeed, is a curious mosaic of "Scripture Proofs"; not a statement is made which is not warranted by chapter and verse. The following passage will show how readily he handled Scripture for his purpose:—

How often and how earnestly doth the Spirit of God entreat and command us in the holy Scriptures to embrace Quietness? We are commanded to love peace (Zach. viii. 19); neither is it sufficient to love it, but we must also wish for it (2 Thess. iii. 12); neither is it sufficient to wish for it, but we must seek it (Psalms xxxiv. 14); neither is it sufficient to seek for it, but we must also have it (Mark ix. 50). But what if peace will not be had? Lo, then, St. James chargeth us to make peace (James iii. 18). How must we make peace? By endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace (Ephes. iv. 3). What if once made and had, it will not stay with us? Then St. Paul willeth us to follow those things which concern peace (Rom. xiv. 19). What if it will needs away and hide itself? Yet then St. Peter bids us to follow and enquire after it (1 Peter iii. 11). What if we know not how to follow or where to find it? Yet we must not give over, but (according to the counsel of the Apostle Paul) we must study for it: Study (saith he) to be quiet (1 Thess. iv. 11).

Yet, greatly as we may admire the Bishop of Limerick's mastery of the art of apt quotation, it is not for that that we love his book. It is for the spirit of simple earnest piety that pervades its pages; for its essentially practical character; for the broad and brotherly sympathy which it evinces. One can hardly doubt that Jeremy Taylor modelled his Holy Living to some extent upon it. The same method is seen in both. Not only is the malady diagnosed, but the remedy is prescribed. The Bishop of Limerick's book deals with the "Practice (not the theory) of Quietness," and, as its sub-title purports, "directs a Christian how to live quietly in this troublesome world." Take the following passage:—

Enter into thy closet, commune with thine own heart, examine thine own self, call thyself after this manner to account: "How do I feel myself affected towards Quietness? How do I study to be quiet? Have I never been unquiet? Have I never been too testy and prone to wrath? Have I not been too suspicious? Have I not been too litigious? Have I not been envious? Have I not been too contentious?" If thou findest that in any of these, at any time, thou hast overshot thyself—as, who sometimes does not slip over-shoes?—then lament for thy former unquietness, &c.

This shows that Bishop Webb was a thorough physician of souls. Yet there is no savour of unhealthy introspection—nothing suggestive of the morbidness of Ignatius Loyola's "Spiritual Exercises."

He appeals to his hearers by the kindness of his sympathy. He places himself in the position of the person whom he is counselling or admonishing; views things from his standpoint, makes all due allowances, and then shows the "more excellent way," and how to attain it. Thus he deals successively with the cases of the husband and wife, the parent and child, the master and servant, and shows how each may do his duty towards the other in his proper station. As an arbiter between one and the other, he is strictly fair and impartial. He will have the wife treated on an absolutely equal footing with the husband. The same judicial attribute enables him to detect and unmask a fallacy, however plausible. He sees the mischief of the argument that an ill-assorted couple were better separated, for the sake of that very Quietness which is his theme. Whether his sacramental view of the marriage-tie does not lead him too far, some may doubt. None will deny the general applicability of his words.

What could be better advice, or, more happily expressed, than the following admonition to parents? "Let them do as guides that show the right way over fords and rivers, by going before those whom they lead, that their children following their steps may conform themselves unto their virtues, and so with them and by them may learn quietness."

Breadth of outlook and moderation of tone characterise his views of war and law, both of which he regarded not as essentially sinful, but as means only justified when other resources fail. Of the first, "I am," says he, "far from that Anabaptistical phrensy, as simply to deny the Lawfulness of War, or peremptorily to condemn all use of arms; for I know that there is a time for War as well as for Peace (Eccles. iii. 8). I acknowledge that wars are sometimes of equity, sometimes of necessity, and many times both approved and upheld by divine authority." Of the second, he says: "Going to law must be the last refuge. Law is a kind of war. As, therefore, war is the last means for the attaining of the public peace, so should the law be the last means for the attaining of private peace. All means must first be tried before we sue the law; and if none other means will serve, then this may lawfully have his course." His sketch of a lawyer's duties—for its quaint antithetical and figurative style—might have been taken bodily from the "Religio Medici."

He should be an Atropos to cut off the web of controversies between man and man, not a Lachesis to draw out in length the thread of their contention. He should be an Celipus to unite the knots of difficult and doubtful controversies, not a Sphinx to entangle it with more knots; or like Hydra, which for every head struck off, raised up seven more. He should be a physician to heal the unquiet maladies of the Body politic; and therefore he must not deal like an unfaithful Surgeon, who for his great gain doth poison the wound, that it may be the longer healing.

Here is a helpful passage touching duty towards one's neighbour:

As in a common fire every one will be ready to extinguish, and as for a common good every man will be ready to put to his helping hand; so every honest, every Christian neighbour must be ready with all his endeavour to labour to extinguish the flame of variance, and to settle peace one with another.

And here one upon the efficacy of prayer:

Pray for the peace of Jerusalem (Psalms cxx. 6.) Art thou in trouble?—pray for thy peace. Dost thou live in peace and quietness?—pray for the continuance of it. Prayer getteth quietness; prayer keepeth quietness; prayer is the very lock of quietness. Therefore, when thou hast performed all the rest, fail not in this, for this is more effectual to the study of quietness than all the rest: when thou canst not prevail with men hereby, thou shalt be sure to prevail with God.

It would be easy and pleasant to dwell upon the literary merits of this godly treatise; but space-limitations forbid, and there is the less need, in that the passages already quoted serve as fair samples of its style. The following excerpt, however, cannot be spared, both on account of its eloquence and beauty, and because it contains one of Webb's favourite arguments, which his dual study of sacred and profane literature must have often suggested to him. "If such were the constancy of the Heathen, much more firm should be the resolution of us Christians, for the gaining and retaining of quiet minds. Our minds should be like unto the Adamant, which no knife can cut; like the Salamander, whom no fire can burn; like the Rock, which no waves can shake; like the Cypress Tree, which no weather can alter; like the Hill Olympus, higher than storm or tempest, wind or weather, can reach unto; or rather like Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but standeth fast for ever (Psalms cxxv. 1)."

Some of Webb's metaphors are well worth notice, such as the following:—"Fullness of business fills the head with much unquietness: let our desires therefore be moderate, our labours temperate, and our minds content: so shall we be able to carry a more even sail, and have a more quiet passage through the unquiet sea of this troublesome world." A sample of the Bishop's irony must bring this imperfect notice to a close:—

But what quietness is that which most commonly the common people do affect or expect from the Ministry? If their Pastor do not trouble them (so they deem it) with much preaching, if he let them alone in their sins, and do not speak against their vanities, but temporise, and soothe them up in their sinful humours; O such a Pastor is a quiet man, a peaceable priest, a right churchman, a chaplain for their turn; but if he be a Pastor which hath respect unto his conscience in his calling, if he preach the Word in season and out of season (2 Tim. iv. 1, 2, 3); if he reprove sin, withstand vanities, and labour in his place to beat down ungodliness, let his habit be never so conformable, his conversation never so commendable, and his practice never so peaceable, yet he shall be reputed an unquiet man, and (as Ahab thought of Elias) a troubler of Israel.

LITERATURE.

THE RECREATIONS OF A CITY PARSON.*

MR. BLATCHFORD is known far beyond the limits of the city in which he has ministered for over thirty years; and known to many who never saw him as a most felicitous writer of hymns. His work is in Lewin's Mead, Bristol—just as Charles Lamb's "Works" (so he said) were at the India House in a stupendous number of folios. We are glad to have, in the volumes before us, the fruits of some of his lighter moods.

Mr. Blatchford has, we know, been very successful in interesting the young people of his congregation in the study of ancient history, and some of the stories he has told in prose, have sung themselves to him in verse; and here we have them in print, in the form of a handsome volume, embellished with a few good pictures somewhat in the style of those which made Kingsley's Heroes beautiful to our young eyes. The author dedicates the Idylls to "The Sixth Classical in England's Public Schools," with a grateful reference to his own old headmaster. The only thing we are disposed to carp at in the Idylls (beyond the fact that there are not enough of them) is their title. We felt instinctively that a lay that recalls Macaulay's "Horatius," with a dash of "Marmion" thrown in, could not be an idyll. We consulted our dictionary, and we knew we were right. An idyll, says that authority, is "a short pastoral." Now there is nothing pastoral about Mr. Blatchford—except a pastoral charge. In fact, to use the words of another poet, "his ideas are excessively nautical." His pipe is of the boatswain rather than of the shepherd; and he probably prefers Dibdin to Theocritus. In our opinion, his best fight is that which takes him out to sea, in "The Rescue-Ship."

The first lay "Marathon" is strong and spirited. The story is supposed to be told by an old "man of Marathon" to his grandson, at the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War, B.C. 431. Besides plenty of good fighting, it contains some of those touches which remind a reader who once knew some Greek history, of details he would not willingly let go—for example, the death of Cynegeirus; and the advent of the thousand Plataeans, at the moment when Sparta sent excuses, and Athens stood alone against the barbarian—a comradeship which Athens did not forget, for as long as Plataeae existed, at the close of her public prayers arose the great popular response, "For ourselves and for the Plataeans."

A lonely band we gathered there;
'Twas Athens 'gainst a world!
And fearless, in th' invaders' teeth
Their challenge back she hurled.
Those Spartans, tethered to their priests,
Stayed gaping at the moon!
Alone the staunch Plataeans ranged
With us that afternoon.

To cries of welcome, shouts of joy,
Resounding far and nigh,
The lads who wore the leathern helm
With steady swing went by.
For true and loyal to the last,
Plataea gave her all,
Content in that dread hour to share
Our triumph, or our fall!

The second poem is "The Traitor Greek," relating the fate of Pausanias, to which is prefixed an essay "On the Making of Traitors," wherein, as in the next "On the Rescinding of a Popular Vote," are to be found, by the observing eye, some sound political lessons. As we have already hinted, our author's heart and soul are to be found in "The Rescue-Ship." The story is, perhaps, not so generally known as the others. The occasion was the revolt of Mitylene in Lesbos (B.C. 427); this, occurring at the moment of the greatest depression of Athens beneath the scourges of war and plague, threatened to deal a fatal blow to Athenian supremacy. By a tremendous effort, Athens grappled with the danger: Mitylene was invested and reduced to capitulation. The Athenian generals sent to Athens to know what punishment should be meted out to the recaptured city. The popular assembly of Athens, urged by Cleon to prompt vengeance, decreed the wholesale massacre of adult males, and the slavery of the women and children; and the Government despatch-boat, the Salamina, was sent off to bear the decree to Lesbos. But the better soul of Athens repented of her heat and haste. The popular vote was, by a small majority, rescinded. Twenty-four hours after the despatch of the Salamina, a trireme was sent off to recall the former orders. How she sped on her errand of mercy, her crew rowing night and day without cessation (and making, so Mr. Blatchford conjectures, a speed of about seven and a-half miles an hour), and arrived with the reprieve in time to prevent the massacre, is the subject of "The Rescue-Ship."

The story is told with a swiftness and dash which is quite inspiring: a few stanzas will illustrate this:—

The rippling rush of parted seas
That dashed the bows around,
The measured beat of pine-wood oars
Had music in their sound:
So, southward, like majestic bird
That wings a tireless flight,
With feathering blades the good ship flew
Before the westering light,
And, eastward, by the solemn steep
Of Sunium grim and high,
That showed like lonely watch-tower black
Against the crimson sky.
Then wondrously rock, mountain, shore
In peace were folded all,
With naught astir—save from the cliff
The weary sea-fowl's call—
Or where the murm'ring waters lapped
The Naiads' haunts among—
Or where from temple on the hill
Arose the evening song.
Then mystic shadows silent came
Like vanguards of the night,
When Macris robed in sombre grey
Rose full upon their sight.

They caught the timid bleat of flocks
 From grassy knoll and dell,
 With lowings of the sleepy kine
 That floated from the fell. . . .
 And soon with lamp of ruddy gold
 The moon lights up the skies—
 As 'twere in pity, beckoning on Where weeping Lesbos lay,
 And smiling o'er the mariners
 Along their weary way.
 With softened ray the glory bathed
 Geraestus' lonely hill,
 Where gleamed Poseidon's temple old
 In radiance white and still.
 They might not stay, they could but pray
 The God who filled the fane
 To bind the treacherous sea, and lay
 His trident on the main. . . .
 Unceasing ever! Not for them
 The sleep the weary slept!
 For 'neath the setting moon, their oars
 A clanking rhythm kept,
 Till broke the dawn in silver light,
 And showed where far away,
 Like fleecy cloud 'twixt sea and sky,
 Ionian Chios lay.

The general movement, and the point-to-point allusions, remind one pleasantly of the sailing stanzas in the "Lord of the Isles," canto iv.

"Studies in Religion from Shakespeare" is a booklet of excellent reading: it consists of six short-essays, pointed and illustrated by apt quotations. There is very little dealing with matter of controversy: but at a time when we have in England a school of Roman historians which, having proved, to its own satisfaction, that there was nothing to justify the suppression of the monasteries, and that there never was any Gunpowder Plot, is proceeding—so the literary papers have lately informed us—to prove that Shakespeare was a Romanist, we naturally turn with interest to the essay headed "Catholic or Protestant?" As Mr. Blatchford points out, Shakespeare's cast of mind was remote from contemporary Puritanism: he is not attracted by the Zwinglian within the Church, or the Brownist outside it. While he maintains the supremacy of the crown of England against the Papacy as a foreign domination, he always deals tenderly with the sacraments and doctrines of the Church. Mr. Blatchford is doubtless quite correct when he says:—"We shall search in vain to find Shakespeare holding up the teachings or the ceremonies of Catholicism to anything even approaching to contempt. . . . In and out among his wonderful creations there runs the same reverence of thought concerning cherished prayer and ritual that gave expression to the older Church's belief in things divine." But when our author adds "Satire and sarcasm he has, and upon the field of religious experience too, but these are reserved for the hypocrite, the strait-laced, sour-visaged zealot. . . ." we should say that he does not represent the whole case. The religion of Shakespeare is continuous; in moral power, and in his sense of the reality of eternal things, he grows, from the earliest dramas to the last; there is no sudden conversion, no abrupt change. He is full of sympathy with Catholic piety: he is saturated with Scriptural knowledge, gained from the Bible itself, and applied with the keenest insight into its human interest, its wisdom and its pathos. But you cannot say—At this point he threw over the Roman system, and studied the Bible. Nor can we conceive that his religion, thus determined and balanced by his own personality, was derived from the society, or the surroundings, with which his London life provided him. He did not catch it from the theatre or the Court. Perhaps all we can say is, that in the midst of a society much secularised by the new learning, yet never paganised like the Italy of the Renaissance, Shakespeare maintained his religion. To ask what he called it, is like asking what temple Plato habitually attended. He takes no cognisance of the Elizabethan bishop, or of the Puritan who was suffering under High Commissions and Injunctions. Must we not conclude that it was in his home at Stratford, and from his father John, who, if the will cited as his be genuine, commended his soul "to Almighty God, and to the Blessed Mary, ever Virgin," that Shakespeare gained his reverence for piety and doctrine of the mediæval type? And may we not with probability class John Shakespeare with those Catholics who conformed to the Elizabethan settlement (at least until the issue of the Pope's bull against the Queen in 1570), and who were staunch on the national side at the time of the Armada? Now, we should say that if one thing is certain about Shakespeare's youth, it is that he was not brought up to respect the local curate. It is not the Puritan, but the ordinary provincial parson—the Sir Oliver Martext of the Forest of Arden—on whom Shakespeare pours contempt. And he runs back to what were to him poetic ideals, in his conception of the life consecrated to the ministries of religion, and finds them in the traditions of the mendicant orders, and of good monks and nuns "enskied and sainted" in the memories of the country-side. He turns from the pedantic Sir Nathaniel, Sir Thopas the curate, and Sir Hugh Evans, who is making the new secular life of the clergy ridiculous by dangle after sweet Ann Page (and we are apt to forget how new this view of the curate overtly in love, of the clergyman as a possible match for a girl of some position, was to the England of Shakespeare's time), and thinks of the unworldly simplicity of good Franciscans like Friar Laurence and Friar John. Truly, Shakespeare was hardly likely to conceive a high opinion of a clergy the vast majority of whom had been Anglo-Catholics under Henry VIII., strong Protestants under Edward VI., Roman Catholics under Mary, and were—whatever the Queen might please to call them, under Elizabeth.

And, unless we are greatly mistaken, it is largely owing to the consequent absence of any reliance upon any help to be derived from contemporary church and clergy, that Shakespeare's religion is so personal, so entirely "without priest and without ritual," so deeply based in conscience, and so peacefully reliant, in all that relates to the future, upon the broadest faith in the eternal Justice and Mercy. An ample justification of this description is found in Mr. Blatchford's three last essays. But one additional note may perhaps be in place: nothing impresses us more—it may be that as the years go on, one grows more into sympathy with the poet's later thought—than Shakespeare's feeling, growing more intense towards his closing days, of the shortness of human righteousness, the blindness of human justice, the sinfulness of human vengeance; the vanity of the whole mediæval idea of administering God's judgments on earth; and the solemn hush that ought to fall on all human differences, in view of the eternal realities. Hence, the only things of permanent value are forgiveness, reconciliation, and refraining from the strife of tongues; while the devout soul sees more and more clearly that purity and peace are the things that shall abide, when the cloud-landscape that floats before the eye of human ambition shall dissolve, and "leave not a wrack behind." This deep undertone of solemn thought seems to us to be heard more and more distinctly in the later plays; but we are quite aware that the notion of dealing with the growth of the poet's mind lay entirely outside our author's immediate purpose; and we are grateful to him for a work which will be exceeding profitable to anyone who seeks a guide to the religious side of Shakespeare's teaching, and (we are sure Mr. Blatchford will not think such usefulness beneath the dignity of his little book) very useful for ministers' classes and congregational reading-circles.

THE HIDDEN CHESS-PLAYER.

SIR,—Mr. Hargrove, remarking upon his sermon "The Ways of God: a Lesson from a Game of Chess," thinks he may be partly indebted for the illustration to Rev. S. Cox's paper entitled "The Sceptical Pawn." I do not know the date of Mr. Cox's paper, but I have always thought that we owe this illustration to Professor Huxley; and as it is so good as he gives it, and seems to be half-forgotten, I will ask your leave to reproduce it. It occurs in an address on a "Liberal Education," given at the South London Working Men's College, on Jan. 4, 1868, subsequently published in Macmillan's Magazine, and afterwards included in the volume of "Lay Sermons."

"Suppose it were perfectly certain that the life and fortune of every one of us would, one day or other, depend upon his winning or losing a game at chess, don't you think we should all consider it to be a primary duty to learn at least the names and moves of the pieces; to have a notion of a gambit, and a keen eye for all the means of giving and getting out of check? Do you not think that we should look with a disapprobation amounting to scorn, upon the father who allowed his son, or the State which allowed its members, to grow up without knowing a pawn from a knight?"

"Yet it is a very plain and elementary truth, that the life, the fortune and the happiness of everyone of us, and more or less of those who are connected with us, do depend upon our knowing something of the rules of a game infinitely more difficult and complicated than chess. It is a game which has been played for untold ages, every man and woman of us being one of the two players in a game of his or her own. The chess-board is the world, the pieces are the phenomena of the universe, the rules of the game are what we call the laws of Nature. The player on the other side is hidden from us. We know that his play is always fair, just and patient. But also we know, to our cost, that he never overlooks a mistake, or makes the smallest allowance for ignorance. To the man who plays well, the highest stakes are paid, with that sort of overflowing generosity with which the strong shows delight in strength. And one who plays ill is check-mated—without haste, but without remorse.

"My metaphor will remind some of you of the famous picture in which Retsch has depicted Satan at chess with man for his soul. Substitute for the mocking fiend in that picture, a calm, strong angel who is playing for love, as we say, and would rather lose than win—and I should accept it as an image of human life."

I was a very young man when this was said; but I remember remarking at the time that the Hidden Chess-player would become a standard illustration.

WESTBOROUGH CHURCH, SCARBOROUGH.

SIR,—We have just been reading over a Circular issued to the Unitarians of England in 1876, which was signed by the following gentlemen:—Joseph Lupton, President of the B. and F.U.A., the Rev. G. Vance Smith, D.D., the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., George Buckton (Leeds), Joseph Cliff (Leeds), the Rev. W. H. Channing, B.A., James Hopgood (Clapham Common, London), and the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, B.A.

That circular appealed for subscriptions towards the building of the new church at Scarborough, and made a special point of the intention to provide a really good and suitable place of worship for Unitarians visiting Scarborough.

The appeal met with a liberal response, and the church has, since its foundation, always been kept free from debt.

In 1897, the Jubilee Year, our Committee resolved to raise money in order to complete what was left unfinished in 1877, by building a new vestry, kitchen, and other structural alterations, re-decorating the interior of the church, purchasing a new organ, and adding the electric light. Our own congregation raised £252 9s. 9d. They then appealed to the Unitarians of England and the B. and F.U.A.; and again the response was most gratifying. All the objects we aimed at have been accomplished. The pointing of the outside of the building has now become necessary, and we hope shortly to be in a position to defray that expense. And now we come to the point we want particularly to emphasise. The season is upon us when people in large numbers are coming to spend their holiday in Scarborough, and we urge all Unitarians to attend the services at, what we think, one of the most attractive Unitarian churches in England. Especially we invite the kind friends who so generously helped us to come and see for themselves how we have spent their money; and we continue to remind all your readers of the fact that our visitors are an essential part of our constitution, because this costly church was built, not only for the residents, who are few in number, but for all the Unitarians of England in general, and of Yorkshire in particular.

Those visitors who do come are kind in supporting us. It is our misfortune and not our fault that a great many find other holiday places more attractive. To these we may suggest that what our offertory loses by their absence, our resources may gain in another way. We are providing an excellent opportunity for friends, far and near, to strengthen us by their sympathy and substantial aid in the Sale of Work, to be held on August 29, 30, and 31, and opened by our member, J. Compton Rickett, Esq. Our Committee have just issued their twenty-fifth annual report. A quarter of a century has allowed time enough to judge of the cause here. The hopes of those who started it, though very few of them are with us now to judge, have been fully justified, as to which we might quote interesting testimony lately offered by our fellow-townsfolk and Unitarian friends who watch us from afar.

We trust we may close the present century and enter upon our second quarter of that period in the happy consciousness of a balance-sheet, which shall be, in its way, as fair to see as the four-square fairness of our renovated church.

OBITUARY.

SIR PHILIP MANFIELD.

FOLLOWING close upon his wife and her sister, we are called upon to mourn the loss of Sir Philip Manfield, of Northampton, who passed away on Monday, having only a few days before completed his eightieth year. The end was not unexpected, for Sir Philip had been for some time seriously ill, and while in spirit ever young, old age had laid relentless hands upon his once stalwart frame. We have to record a long and honourable life peacefully ended.

We recorded quite recently the unanimous decision of the Northampton Council to confer the honorary freedom of the borough upon Sir Philip, as the first to receive that honour, and on Wednesday of last week, his eightieth birthday, a meeting was held in the Town-hall, at which his portrait, painted by Mr. Arthur Hacker, A.R.A., was presented by the Mayor to Sir Philip's sons, as he could not be there to receive it, together with an address, expressive of admiration for his character and gratitude for his public services.

In responding on behalf of his father, Mr. Alderman Harry Manfield said that when asked what response should be made, Sir Philip had replied: "I am deeply touched by the great kindness of my many friends. Thank them simply and say that I shall be ever grateful for that kindness." Those words were thoroughly characteristic of the man, in whom simplicity and a most kindly, generous nature were blended with great capacity and sterling worth.

Philip Manfield was born July 26, 1819, and spent the early years of his life at Bristol. As a plain working man he settled at Northampton nearly sixty years ago, and being engaged in the shoe trade, by his remarkable energy and foresight gradually built up the great business now known throughout the country as the firm of Messrs. Manfield and Sons. As a manufacturer who knew the worth of first-rate work, and the best methods of bringing it before the public, he commanded success, and became a wealthy man, but so as to retain the simplicity of his nature and his ardent popular sympathies to the last. No man, we should say, was ever less spoiled by growing riches, or with more ready generosity made a better use of the means at his disposal. His home was beautiful, in its outward grace and ready hospitality, no less than in its inward spirit, and in his private beneficence he had the constant support of his wife and her sister. No public charity in the town and no movement for further enlightenment or benefit of the community lacked his earnest sympathy and help, while in his growing business relations he commanded the respect and confidence of masters and men alike. He rendered most efficient service in securing the introduction of arbitration for the settlement of disputes in the shoe trade throughout the country. His successful settlement of the Bristol dispute in 1890 was but one instance of what he effected in this direction. With his own workmen his relations were the happiest, his treatment of the older men, especially when past work, being marked by the most considerate kindness.

For many years Mr. Manfield was a member of the town council, serving as councillor and alderman for various terms, and as Mayor from 1882 to 1885. In 1891, on the death of Mr. Bradlaugh, he was elected to represent the borough in Parliament. He was a justice, both of the borough and county, and in 1894 was knighted.

A Radical in politics, Sir Philip had been since his early manhood a convinced and earnest Unitarian. His deep interest in the Northampton congregation was crowned when he and Lady Manfield gave for its use, the beautiful new church in Kettering-road. Sir Philip was a member of the council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and if his parliamentary and other duties had allowed, would some years ago have been President.

We have lost a true friend, who, as a director, took a warm and practical interest in this journal, as he did in every effort, so far as his opportunities allowed, which he judged to make for progress and enlightenment, for the well-being of the people, and the maintenance of a reverent religious life.

The funeral took place on Thursday afternoon at Northampton.

THE address on "The Sunday School Teacher as Social Reformer," given last Whitsuntide by Mr. John Dendy as President of the Sunday School Association, and which was printed at the time in these columns, has now been issued by the Association in a very convenient form for wide distribution, and may be had from Essex Hall for the cost of postage. On the back of the little pamphlet we are reminded of Mr. Dendy's book, "Successful Life," a series of essays in which he has shown by admirable example how to deal in elder classes with those moral questions on the vital importance of which his paper rightly laid so much stress.

THE INWARD LIFE.

THIS infinite pleasure of the whole of Nature was felt to be by Wordsworth, not only symbolic of, but actually, the joy of God in His own life. It was God who renewed each moment in the boundless delight of all things, His "ancient rapture" in the continuous act of creation; it was God Himself who rejoiced in the brook and the tree, in the daisy and the lark. It is a thought which should add a new element to our happiness. For in our worst sadness we ought not to be too morose to be glad of the pleasure of all things—in our worst grief the sense of God's enjoyment which we receive from the joy of Nature ought to come with healing to our hearts.

The second characteristic of the life of Nature is its quietude. She has joy, ecstasy in life, but it is untroubled ecstasy. We are "pressed by heavy laws," tormented by doubt, and rent by struggle against conditions which we will not obey at once. Nature's life is at peace, for her children never wage a foolish strife with her; nor does self enter their hearts to make them weary of life. Deep calm is at her heart, the mountains rest in their own peace, the stars shine quietly, the sun "sinks down in his tranquillity," the flowers keep a still silence, and though there are storms which drive the clouds in passionate course, and torrents which rend the earth, and strong forces which sweep to and fro the elements in bewildering and endless motion, yet in the higher region of thought, in which these things are seen in their relation to the great whole, there is

"Central peace subsisting at the heart
Of endless agitation."

And this too—this tranquil being in each thing which sends "its own deep quiet to restore our hearts," this central peace, was not self-born in Nature—it was in Wordsworth's thought the ineffable calm of God's existence which spoke to us and redeemed us.—Stopford A. Brooke, Lecture on Wordsworth in "Theology in the English Poets."

"Love had he found in huts where poor men lie;

His daily teachers had been woods and rills,

The silence that is in the starry sky,
The sleep that is among the lonely hills.

—Wordsworth.

How welcome to our ears, long pained
By strife of sect and party noise,
The brook-like murmur of his song
Of nature's simple joys!

The violet by its mossy stone,
The primrose by the river's brim,
The chance-sown daffodil, have found
Immortal life through him.

The sunrise on his breezy lake,
The rosy tints his sunset brought,
World-seen are gladdening all the vales
And mountain peaks of thought.

—J. G. Whittier.

He found us when the age had bound
Our souls in its benumbing round;
He spoke and loosed our heart in tears.
He laid us as we lay at birth
On the cool flowery lap of earth,
Smiles broke from us and we had ease;
The hills were round us, and the breeze

Went o'er the sunlit fields again;
Our foreheads felt the wind and rain.
Our youth returned; for there was shed
On spirits that had long been dead,
Spirits dried up and closely furled
The freshness of the early world.

—Matthew Arnold.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HOLIDAYS! What a pleasant word it is, and how many thousands of pairs of bright young eyes—yes, and old ones too—grow brighter still when they think of it!

Holidays! How slowly the last few days at school used to drag away, and how excitedly we went for the very last day; and yet, somehow, when it was all over, and the schoolmaster had told us how long holiday we had, and we had really "broken up," most of us, I think, felt a pang in leaving the old battered ink-stained desks, and the familiar everyday faces—even the map-hung wall seemed an old friend.

How easily I can recall such a scene—the boys in their places at their desks, the murmur of voices ceased, all still and quiet, for it is the time of "evening prayer." The afternoon sun slants through the diamond-paned windows, the master's voice rises on the silence with the opening words of the collect, "Lighten our darkness, we beseech Thee, O Lord," and the sweet voices of the boys in unison answer in the chanted "Amen."

School-days are very happy days, good at the time, and very good to look back upon. But this, and one or two others to follow, are to be holiday papers, and please let me confess at once, that much I liked school I liked holidays a good deal more.

Are there any of you children who love to roam in flowery lanes, to trudge up mountain slopes, to wander by sparkling "becks," or float on silver lakes? If so, please join, without delay, "Our Children's Touring Club." It has several advantages—for instance, there is no subscription; we travel everywhere free, we pay nothing for food, and if you ever feel tired or moped, why, by a very simple process, you will find yourself at home again.

We want all sorts of children: we want boys who don't mind wading through boggy ground, and getting wet generally; we want girls to pick our sweet flowers and arrange them; and love them, and tell us about them, and we want little ones, to cheer and brighten us; and we want the pale-faced ones to come and enjoy all the beauty, and get back some of their lost health again.

I think we shall have a splendid time together—and, indeed, I am sure we shall for we are all going to do something towards it, and something for each other. The strong boys who think it good fun to squash through a bog, or wade a beck, or climb that particularly thorny Thorn-tree to look in a magpies' nest, I am sure will not mind but indeed be very glad to bring back a bunch of Grass of Parnassus, or a long spray of Antler Moss for the girls. And I know the girls will see that everything is neat and in apple-pie order, though it is tiresome and irksome to attend to little household matters, particularly in holiday-time. As to the little ones and the weak ones—why, of course, we shall all do something; have little easy walks, and get them over stiles and gaps, and have such a good time with them, that it will be as pleasant for us as for them.

Now, children, out with your atlas—country England, county Westmorland, find Windermere Station, run your finger $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (long miles, please!) in a north-westerly direction, and then in a certain valley see if you can find "Whitewashed Cottage" mentioned. What! you cannot see it? Well, I can only assure you that there is such a spot, for I am writing in it now. It is much the same little cottage I described to you last year—the shrubs a little taller, the garden gate and wall a little altered; for, did not a great flood knock the two latter down in November?

Our live-stock, too, are nearly as last year; let us just catalogue them. There, under the eaves, are two house-martins' nests; there was a third, but sparrows have taken and furnished that one. In the big laurel were two blackbirds' homes; in that hole near a spout a large, thriving, and somewhat noisy family of starlings were reared in safety. In that box on the wall Mrs. Spotted Flycatcher hatched out a brood, and when they had been gone about a fortnight, Mrs. S. F. (or a sister of hers) laid five more eggs in the same nest, and is now sitting on them. I will let you know how they get on. In that beck, where it plunges into an underground tunnel, a water-ousel built again, within a foot or two of the nests of 1897 and 1898.

There was nearly a calamity this year, and it was my fault too. I had waded down this underground beck to look at the young ousels, and, putting my hand in the nest, frightened them, and out they came and fell here and there, splash into the water.

I was afraid some of them would be drowned, for probably they had never been out of their nest before, and our little stream runs rather rapidly. I soon found, however, that they were not in much danger, for not only could they swim, but they swam so well and cleverly, it would not have been easy for me to catch them again.

Let me see, there is one more household friend to introduce to you; perhaps you will know him, some of you, but in any case we must leave him for next week.

THE Exhibition of Co-operative Productions, organised by the Labour Association for promoting the co-partnership of the workers, to be held in connection with the Co-operative Festival at the Crystal Palace this month, will be opened by Mr. Gerald Balfour, M.P., Chief Secretary for Ireland. As a member of the Labour Commission, Mr. Balfour heard evidence from several sources as to the value of the co-partnership principle in preventing trade disputes, and latterly in his official capacity must have recognised the advance now being made in Irish agriculture by the extension of the same system of co-operation. Mr. F. Maddison, M.P., will preside at the opening ceremony, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland will find himself surrounded by a host of representative co-operators, trade unionists, and social reformers generally. Amongst those who have opened the exhibition in previous years have been the Bishop of Ripon, Earl Grey, Earl Stamford, and the Hon. T. A. Brassey.

LONDON, AUGUST 5, 1899.

THE GIFT OF SUMMER.

WHILE midsummer is past it has yet become the custom of our people to find in these days the height of summer, inasmuch as during the first weeks of August there are, we suppose, more genuine holiday-makers than at any other time of the year. The August Bank Holiday gives the signal for popular dispersal into the open country, and while for far too many the single day or the week-end is all the share of complete rest amid the summer glory that they can hope for, there is a steadily-increasing number of town-folk helping others to enjoy, and themselves learning to share in, the good gifts of the country. Now the children's Country holiday Funds in many great cities are busy with their beneficent and delightful work, and many another country home is offering to convalescents and to tired workers release from melancholy streets and the trials of a narrow lot. It is true that the little town-bred midget may find with astonishment "shrumps growing" in a barley-field; yet it is the paradise of a new life into which the little ones are led, and Mother Nature has her benediction for the most ignorant of babies. Fresh air and illimitable space and wholesome food work wonders even in those who least understand what it is they are receiving, while to others better taught there is no measure to the delight which their week or fortnight in the country affords. And as with the children so with the elders in their own degree. There is the greatest variety in the kind of holiday that is possible to different people, but there are few of whom we think with so much pleasure as of those who, with very modest means, secure by the wise method of co-operative holidays not only a fuller and more glorious measure of true country delights than would otherwise be possible, but also unexpected treasures of new companionship and happy lessons in a genuine brotherhood.

But whoever and wherever they may be, the thousands who now cease from work and are free to enjoy and to secure the rest and refreshment so much needed, we may surely say that in these days the heart of England is in the open country, and in such a summer as has rarely visited these shores our people are finding their delight.

Of the many gifts of summer that all may share, the first and most universally enjoyed in these days of stress and feverish haste is, perhaps, the gift of rest. There is wisdom in such idleness as the long sunny days invite. Simply to lie still on some grassy bank, in the meadows by a calmly flowing river, in the woods or on the hill side, or on the rocks overlooking the sea, and to feel the air flooded with sunshine, brings a gift of incalculable benefit to tired nerves and the worn spirit. To breathe the quiet air amid the multitudinous fragrance of the country, best of all perhaps among the pine-woods or on moorland heights, unless the keen salt breeze is better, is a veritable renewal of life. And to this restfulness is added the feast of beauty, given without stint, of which there can be no satiety or weariness. Greater wonders may be found in other lands, but not more perfect loveliness, for that is with us close at hand even in very humble places; and we must be thankful indeed to think of what our people can now enjoy in every quarter of this country. The quiet road-side and the lanes, the commons and the meadow-paths, the woods, the river banks, the pleasant hills and wilder heights, the broad expanse of country over which the mountaineer can look, or even he who takes a road that rises only a few hundred feet, the sweeping moors, the surprises of waterfalls hidden among the hills, and streams that lead through fairy glades into many an unexpected delectable land, quaint villages and old-world gardens, the endless charm and grandeur of the rocky coast and the level sands, and everywhere the summer sky over head, and flowers in their own glory—who can recount in a single sentence all the wealth and infinite variety of beauty encircled by our silver seas? And all this is given us to enjoy, that we may live again, and be renewed in mind and body, and in fresh visions of the spirit know who it is, who is the Giver of all our good.

When cheer and strength my soul doth lack,

Thy glory makes me whole:
Amidst Thy summer I win back
The summer of my soul.

THE ENVIRONMENT OF THE SOUL.*

BY THE REV. G. DAWES HICKS, M.A., PH.D.

"I can of mine own self do nothing."—
John v. 30.

Who has not experienced in certain moments of his life the sense of the infinite helplessness of man? To which of you, when gazing into the starry vaults of the heavens at night, or into the depths of the azure sky at noon, has not the consciousness of your own littleness come, threatening to overwhelm you with the thought of your own insignificance and unimportance in the vast All of things? Are you wandering in Nature's bye-ways, then a slight displacement of yonder boulder has only to occur, and the physical frame, which serves the mandates of your thought and will, would be shattered at a single stroke; one fatal step, and the action of the law of gravitation would not fail, although the beating of your heart would cease for ever. Aye, but that is not all. Have you ever wrestled with a great problem of thought, and not felt the longing for an inspiration that might come to you from the boundless spheres of existence to set you on the track of the solution? Just one hint, you feel, and then the clue would be won; just the key to one letter of the sealed writing, and the hieroglyphs would be deciphered. But no; the cry for help receives the answer only of the eternal silence, and for your baffled intellect naught is left but to fold its too venturesome wings. And to those who have ever cherished an ideal of beauty or of goodness, who have ever dreamed a vision of perfection for mankind, how omnipotent and relentless seem at times the forces ranged on the side of what is rather than on that of what ought to be. Estimated by the beating of the timepiece of the universe, our earthly life itself occupies but a moment; and who can find a value for its limited aims and strivings, when account be taken of the measureless flow of the ages that have been and are yet to be? Of what interest will it be a hundred years hence whether you or I have lived the life of the epicure or the saint?

There are theories of Nature and of life upon which reflections such as these could drive home with a resistless logic the conclusions they imply. Start with the conception, that the reality of the vast realm into which you are thrown is but the unconscious working of a heap of powers, dead and lifeless in themselves, but which somehow in their ceaseless whirl manage to fling up, as chance products for a season, spirits that feel and think and will, then, although you still of your own self can do nothing, it will be no kindling spirit whose aid you will seek, but that of the blind forces which gave you birth, and which, like the Mephistopheles of the drama, will be your servants now, but only on condition of becoming your masters at last. And even then their service will be strictly confined within the modest limits of your space of ground, and only their dull insensibility will prevent them grinning at your efforts to break through the confines of your cage. To dodge their intractability where you can, to thwart their blind designs upon your person and your means, therein will your wisdom lie; for your "own self," which can do nothing, is, nevertheless, your all in all. To protect so frail a possession, to secure for it, whilst it is yet day, a maximum of pleasure and a minimum of pain, if not a worthy, will be, at least, the sole end of your activity, which an eternal night will soon convert into a dreamless sleep. "If the gods prefer not virtue to vice," exclaimed the Athenian, Socrates, "it were better to die than to live." Would he, do you think, have set a higher value upon life, if he could have beheld the deaf forces of a nineteenth-century materialism seated upon the thrones of Olympus?

But, if the human self be thus reduced to a powerless phantom, it is not, perhaps, untrue to say that religious thought has sometimes erred in the opposite direction. The divine Author of the universe and of man, who forms the object of its quest, it has pictured as seated in solitary grandeur in a heavenly realm of light, whose ears, indeed, prayers may reach, and from whom at intermittent times supernatural aid may come, but who has His dwelling-place in a region remote from scenes so mundane as these. Here the mechanical forces, which He long ago called into being, still exert their sovereign sway, and the men, whose theatre of action they form, are left to shape their earthly course with Him as spectator, and as critic, rather than as inspirer and as guide. Thus once more, you are thrown upon your "own self," as though, far from being powerless, it were capable of accomplishing all; planted out upon your own streak of territory, upon you, single-handed and alone, the task is laid of working out your own salvation, although the problem is an infinite one, and the store of energy at your disposal is measurable by a few foot pounds. Once let the magnitude of that burden dawn upon the soul, and how often would the cry of anguish escape from human lips, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Forsaken! But what is this "self" of yours, which is supposed to be stranded thus? Regard it as an entity, summed and complete in itself, and what can you say of it? Can you lay your finger upon any feature of it, and insist—This, at least, is mine, and, though I be stript of all borrowed vestments, it will remain to constitute the me that can bid defiance to the powers of destruction? You would have set yourselves a more difficult problem than perhaps you imagine. The bodily structure, for example, you would have at once to surrender. It has grown with your growth, become, as it were, a part of you, but, in many respects, you have as little to do with its life and its development as you have with the planet Mars. It came into being without your being consulted; it performs its essential functions now without your direction. The gases of the air flow in and vivify it, the lungs expand and contract, the heart performs its rhythmic motions, the blood-stream dashes through arteries and veins, and, although your life is absolutely dependent upon one and all these processes, they go on mostly without your being aware of them, and always without your control. Is your science sufficient for the purpose, you can aid or impede them, but with their working you have naught to do. And if you turn from the body to the mind, from the outer to the inner life, is the case, in this respect, much altered? The thoughts and the feelings which constitute the ever-changing panorama of consciousness, and which in their totality make up what we call experience, are they not awakened by, and concerned with, the wide world in which your lot is cast, and without which your soul's existence would resolve itself into a veritable Nirvana? And if you take into account your moral and social life, so obviously dependent upon the human community of which you are a member, and, ultimately, upon the whole of mankind, the problem assumes still more hopeless proportions, and it would soon become clear to you that if you deduct from your being all that is due to Nature and to society, your individuality would be gone too, your "self" would have dwindled to the barest of possessions, and the gospel of selfishness, ever in one form or another, prevalent in the world, may well stand aghast at the impotence of the fetish to which it pays its homage.

We can of our own selves do nothing. How is it, then, that we are capable of being and of doing so much? Can you find anywhere a surer vindication for the assertion, that man is no orphan in a homeless world, than by contemplating the actual achievements of the human spirit, and comparing them with what we should have been justified in expecting, were the materialistic theory true? We must explain things, so we are repeatedly told, by tracing their history, and going back to their origins. Be it so. How comes it, then, that there are creatures on this planet, to whom the earth has yielded up her story, and the constitution of sun and star is no secret, who yet are born of that which never thought a thought, surrounded and encompassed by that which never sees? The very smallness, surely, of their own endowments renders it all the more certain that guidance and aid there must have been, if the long and progressive course of human experience is not to remain an unexplained and unexplainable enigma. Modern biology has itself made use of a conception, which supplies the very analogy we need. Life, it assures us, consists in a constant process of action and reaction, between the animal body and its external environment; it is the result of the continual effort of the former to make use of the latter, to adapt itself to, and avail itself of, elements and powers which are not its own, but capable, nevertheless, of becoming so. The function of environment, in the material world, is throughout to sustain and to further life, to render possible that ceaseless movement which life displays towards higher and more perfect manifestations. In the organism itself lies the principle of vitality, in the environment are the conditions of its exercise. The one is the complement, the completion, the fulfilment of the other; life in vacuo would not be life, Nature ministering to no organic needs would not be Nature.

"Nothing in the world is single;

All things by a law divine

In each other's being mingle."

And of the spiritual life of you and me and the rest of us, that is true no less. It, too, is fed and nurtured, differentiated and advanced, through the environment which encircles it. The individual soul, no less than the individual body, is situate in the midst of a vast sea, the currents and the tides of which are for ever beating upon it, bearing with them the impetus apart from which not a single one of its faculties would be unfolded, penetrating it through and through with an influence and a strength utterly incommensurate with any it could conceivably exert alone. How, then, will you characterise the main features, the essential components, of this great ocean of spirit, in which every human soul, whether aware of it or not, "lives and moves and has its being"? What is the nature of this spiritual environment, that is the complement of our spiritual existence, the source and the condition of its growth and its development? Let me indicate a few of the modes in which its presence may be discerned and known.

Dimly felt, or distinctly recognised, there comes to the consciousness of all men, when once emancipated from the thrall of the appetites, the constantly recurring experience of an exhortation or a command—name it how you will—calling them out of themselves, beseeching or inviting them to a wider outlook, to a larger, fuller, richer life, than that to which they have yet attained. The seeker after truth is stirred by it, when the passionate resolve seizes him to add some new fact, some new thought, to the storehouse of human knowledge. Aye, the student feels it, when, with ever unsatiated and increasing interest, he follows the routes mapped out by the prophets and explorers of earth, longing to be gifted with their insight, to gain some measure of the light vouchsafed to them. The aspiration to understand and to interpret the universe, the ceaseless craving to grasp some few, at least, of the ideas upon which the constitution of Nature is built, the eager, quenchless ambition that one may not live and die upon this planet a stranger and an alien to its wealth of wonder and of meaning—this desire, I say, inbred more or less in every rational intelligence, seems so natural and so common, that not one person in a hundred pauses to consider whence it comes, how it originates, what it is that calls it forth. And yet, surely, it is no mere matter of course, that from the dawn of civilisation even until now, man should have experienced this resolute striving to know, this determined endeavour to make himself familiar with his world. Why is it that he cannot rest, as the animals do, in a state of nescience, that a "divine discontent" urges him to search for the grounds, the causes, the reasons of things? Is the haunting vision of the goal to be reached conjured up, by means of self-regarding instincts, to gratify personal vanity, or serve the purpose of personal pleasure? Never thus will you account for an impulse whose purity would be sullied were the idea of self to enter, whose very hope would be frustrated if prudential considerations stood in its way. No; the quest for knowledge arises in you, and can only so arise, because your mind is in contact with a Mind that is greater, because your intelligence is in touch with an Intelligence that is wider, inspiring within you the assurance that what reason has created reason can reveal, and that you, too, may see things as it sees them. It is the Spirit of Truth, guiding you to Truth's own source, to Truth's own fountain.

Or, regard the matter from the standpoint not of search but of attainment, and the same conclusion presses home. You have followed, we will say, the line of proof that led Newton to the discovery of the law of gravitation. Step by step you have been carried along, thought has been knit to thought, ideas have been combined with ideas, until suddenly the significance of the whole conception flashes upon you, bearing with it a strange sense of constraint, not to be escaped, and you are compelled, absolutely compelled, whether you will or no, to admit that planet is bound to planet, and sun to sun, in the way that Newton found. No personal whim or fancy of your own, no individual wish or crotchet, is of the slightest avail to quell or to suppress the assurance which that process of reasoning engenders. Why? Is it so self-evident, so needless of explanation—that this compulsion—that obliges you to acknowledge that what is, as we say proved, must be true? That reply would be but to shelve the difficulty, not to solve it. No; the imperious authority with which each item of truth, when once perceived, strikes in upon us, demands at least to be accounted for, and I know not how you will do it except by ascribing it to a supreme and ultimate divinity, whose revelations bear upon them this stamp of guarantee. It is the irresistible persuasiveness of God's own spirit, captivating and controlling our own.

Once again, consider the nature of the world, the knowledge of which we acquire. Its materials are plastic to our touch, responsive to our questionings, intelligible to our gaze. They wear no foreign look, they present no intractable surface. How comes it, though, that the intellect of man, thus going out of itself, discovers always and everywhere around a rationality that is not his, a law, an order, a principle, which, whenever and wherever they are found, are reason's own expression, and, so far as we know, can be the expression of nothing else? How comes it that the human soul is never at a loss in this universe of being, but is confident that, wing its flight where it may, it will always find itself at home, because it will find facts that are intelligible everywhere. Nothing can be more certain than that if creation were really cut in two, as it were, with a hatchet, according to the materialistic pattern, on the one side hard mechanism, on the other conscious individuals, this could never be. Mind can only interrogate that which works on the lines of mind, and the human thinker can only decipher his environment because its details are the thoughts of a Thinker who was there before him. The principle in you, by which you know and experience Nature, must be akin to the principle in Nature by which it is able to be known. And so, in the simplest act of knowledge, in the very consciousness of an outside world at all, you are led out of the limitations of your own individuality. God's spirit in you has burst the bounds of your cage, and made you a sharer in the glories of His eternity. "O God, I think Thy thoughts after Thee," was the exclamation of Kepler, when the ground plan of the solar system lay clear before him, and he had acquired an heirloom for mankind. And that is what we are all doing, in our various degrees, from the moment our eyes and ears begin to drink in the wonders of the surrounding scene. Aye, the truth I am urging hath yet another hold on us. For the world not only exists, but has a meaning; it is not only there, but is pregnant with symbolic reference. When the scientist has reduced it to its lowest terms, and presents it as being in all its parts an endless repetition of moving atoms, he is apt sometimes to chill us with the sense of the dread monotony that reigns. But he is describing it, then, only in its barest and rudest aspect; he is analysing its materials and its mechanism, and these, alone, can never exhaust, or indeed express, the deeper, inner significance that shines forth from the whole. God, said Plato, is the great Artist, and works of art have worth and value not to be estimated in terms of the materials out of which they are made. A noble painting is constructed, doubtless, through means of the mineral and other ingredients which compose the colours on its canvas; ochre and chrome and bitumen and the rest are the substances the chemist will recognise. But these are its media only, not its reality; they serve to convey, they do not constitute, the vision, that sends a thrill of elevated joy through the mind of the beholder. And so it is with the great landscape that lies before us all. Thought, skill, beauty, pathos, love—all are envisaged there—and these are the soul of that picture, which can only record itself to other souls and reveal its ideas to those for whom ideas speak. Here, then, we gain a glimpse, and more than a glimpse, of the nature of the soul's environment; here we are in the actual presence of the inner essence of reality; here we realise the infinite life that enfolds and encircles these finite lives of ours. As a fine thinker once put it, "God is the place of spirits."

But our interpretation of that environment would fall far short of exhaustiveness were we to break off here. It affects human personalities in a still more intimate way, not only as leading them onwards, and enabling them to comprehend it; it calls them forth to help in its own creation. Never, at any moment, is the life of man a finished, summed up whole; never at any moment is the process of creation complete so long as man be there. There is a moral, no less than an intellectual growth of souls; and it owes its origin, always, not, as growth in Nature, to propulsion from behind, but to attraction from in front. We pass our days in a world that is; we live for a yet purer, sweeter, nobler world that is to be, and to be only through our co-operation. Before each one of us, young or old, ambitious or modest, self-sacrificing or selfish, there floats the gleam of a higher self, the image of what we should be, and of what in our best moments we all desire to be, ideal, doubtless, but yet so real, that none of the so-called facts of life are more unquestionable, few so certain, as it. The worldling may sneer at it, the callous, flippant nature may turn his eye aside, and then, standing no longer in the focus of consciousness, it will hover a dim and cloudy figure in the indistinct field around. But banish it he cannot; more readily could he obliterate the light of the less eternal sun. And at intermittent moments it will reappear in its native vividness, rebuking a life that is being squandered, sending a quiver of shame through the pitiable thing that calls itself a man! What, then, does it mean, I ask again, this encompassing of our little life that now is with the vaster ideal life that ought to be? What does it mean, this wider circle of ideal good, of ideal virtue, that is for ever transforming our present goodness and virtue into more perfect types? It means that there in that illimitable region of holy aspiration, there in that infinite circle of moral loveliness and beauty into which our present horizon is for ever seeking to expand, there in that limitless heaven of things that are not now but yet must be, that there, whence the beckoning image comes that draws us upwards, is the dwelling place of that Spirit to whom, in our truest moments of inspiration, we give the name of God.

These, then, are some of the ways in which the soul's environment is disclosed to us, in which it reveals to us its nature and its essence. We are surrounded on every side by a divine life, and cannot be God's outlaws even if we would. I dwell not now on that more spiritual communion still, which, abolishing all the limitations of finitude, flies at once from the circumference to the centre, and abides in rapturous unity with the inner heart of Him whom it adores. Such was the inspiration of the holiest of us all, as he contemplated the path of love and duty, and realised that the way to redeem mankind lay through the self-sacrifice of the Cross. "I can of mine own self do nothing," was his own estimate of the power that was his, and it has been the estimate, too, of theirs by the purest souls of earth. But ranged as he was on the side of the mighty Spirit at the heart of the world, the representative as he was of a law of righteousness, which, if it holds at all, must be equally valid on the confines of the milky way as upon this planet, his power was unlimited. The omnipotence of Heaven was at his service; he could do all things through the Father who strengthened him.

The studies of this place cannot, of themselves, give you a consciousness of that kind, but they will ill fulfil their purpose, if they do not awaken within you the assurance that, in every theme you handle, you are in contact with this spiritual environment of which I have spoken. I think that this University Extension Movement has arisen from a need that is becoming more and more deeply felt in our busy active lives. One of the most suggestive of English writers spoke of what he called "the spiritual fatigue of the world," meaning thereby that for most of us the sense of the divine surroundings of our lot is being dulled by the multitude of small distractions and petty cares, of which the modern world is full, but which did not exhaust the strength of our forefathers, and ought not to exhaust ours. The consequence is, he contends, that we hover, in a state of nervous tension, on the boundary that divides religious conviction from religious doubt, tottering feebly towards the one, shrinking vaguely from the other, only half-believing in the divinity that is for us "sicklied o'er by the pale cast" of sceptical hesitation. But, if I mistake not, the motive that has brought you here has arisen from the conviction that life is poor and maimed, when thus it is narrowed and shut off from the very objects that make it worth while to toil. "He who hath not meditated much upon God, the human soul, and the summum bonum," said Bishop Berkeley, "may indeed make a thriving earthworm, but will most indubitably make a sorry patriot or a sorry statesman," and, we may add, a sorry man of business too. But from the deep undercurrents of the life through which the material labour of the world is done, I think I hear the faint, half-articulated tones of a voice which is the promise and the potency of better things. "Students of God," it seems to say, "tell us of Him; help us to realise the Power we feel to be so near and yet so far; point to us the way that shall lead us to the haven of assured trust and hope." Strive, then, to carry away with you the message that can satisfy that longing, and meet that need. Gathering here from the active centres of our country's industry, be you the links that bind the manual toilers and the mental thinkers of the world together, so that the light and leading of Oxford shall radiate with ever-widening influence through our land. And for yourselves, may it mean the attainment of that liberty of mind, of that serenity of outlook, which is the heritage of those who have learnt to interpret the environment of the soul.

"The noble spirit then is free
And saved from evil scheming,
Whoe'er aspires unweariedly
Is not beyond redeeming."

"ETHICS IN ITS RELATION WITH RELIGION."—II.

BY THE REV. C. B. UPTON, B.A., B.SC.*

In our moral consciousness we are in immediate relation with the Eternal One. That Eternal One is speaking to us not from without but from within; and there is no other voice speaking from without that possesses any intrinsic right to gain-say or to overrule this direct deliverance of God to the individual soul. But man's moral insight always contains changing and progressive elements as well as divine and eternal ones. It is quite true that wise teachers and wise books may enable us to revise and exalt our ideas of what is true and right, but these truer and loftier conceptions can carry with them no ultimate authority until a man's own reason and conscience endorse them; and then it is no longer an outward authority on which we rely, but the same inward direct authority of the indwelling God.

Now, this view of the immediate contact and intimate present relationship between the Absolute One and the individual soul is, as I have said, the view of Jesus and of the early Christian teachers, especially of those of the Eastern or Greek Church; and what is most interesting and important in relation to my present subject is that this doctrine of God's immanence, or living presence, in all rational souls is just now re-asserting itself as a new birth all over Christendom, and is in very many quarters creating a grand revival of interest in both theology and religion.

For many centuries this sublime view of God as the inward light of reason and conscience that lighteth every man that comes into the world has been suppressed and supplanted by another view of God's relation to the soul which was sanctioned by the Romish Church when imperial Rome was outwardly converted to Christianity, and when the religion of Jesus as conceived by the deep-thinking Greeks was intellectually degraded in order to adapt it to the practical but less spiritual Roman mind, and to the work of Christianising the Teutonic and other semi-barbarous nations who had come under the Roman sway. One of the main features of this Roman conception of God is that God acts upon the souls of men from without, as a ruler acts upon his subjects or an engineer upon his engine. It is largely to the mighty mind of St. Augustine that the world owes this narrow form of Christian theology which has dominated Western Christendom for so many centuries. Through the adaptation of this Augustinian conception to a comparatively childish condition of thought, it has, no doubt, been for ages, upon the whole, a great influence for good; but at the same time, by reason of the fundamental error by which what was true in it was adulterated, it has also done much mischief; and now at length has come into such open collision with modern science and modern philosophy that, were it not happily being replaced as it is in the present day, by a return to the far deeper and grander idea of God as immanent or indwelling in nature and in humanity, Christianity as a theological system must have entirely collapsed.

The combined greatness and narrowness of mind which so well fitted Augustine for the work of drawing up a scheme of theological thought suitable to the special needs of the Roman empire at the time have been thus graphically depicted in a recent pamphlet on "The Real Issue in the Ritualistic Controversy," by Dr. Anderson, a Presbyterian minister in Dundee:—

St. Augustine was one of the few great men of the world; a master-thinker of deep piety and profound learning—the proof of which is the fact that he was not only the teacher of Romanism, but that Protestantism, after it renounced the sacerdotal errors that had sprung out of his theology, still clung to his theory of Election. He has thus ruled the minds of men in the domain of religious thought for well-nigh fifteen centuries. The root thought of his system is his idea of God, whom he conceived of, as we have seen, as a monarch ruling the world from without, whose Almighty will was law. In accordance with this idea, the peculiar features which marked the old Roman empire passed, by a kind of heredity, into the new Roman Church. It is just to say that in the "Confessions" of St. Augustine, where we come in contact with the deep piety of the man, rather than the dogma of the ecclesiastic, we have frequently another view of the Deity. This of necessity, for religion is in its essence communion with God. But the controlling principle of Augustine's formal theology, which made possible the Papacy, and which moulded the ecclesiasticism of the Middle Ages, was the idea of God as separate from the world. The connection between God and man was by what he called "grace," which was not given to man freely, as Paul teaches, but was the exclusive possession of the Church. The Church is the one source of truth; in its visible communion alone salvation is to be found.

Now that this theological system with its doctrines of the Fall of Man, of Original Sin, and of Vicarious Atonement has done some good service in the religious education of Europe may well be admitted; but a glance at the history of the Church reveals also the widespread mischief it has wrought. It has concealed and denied the all-important fact that God is ever present in the soul as the light of its reason and of its conscience, and has made His supreme Revelation to man to come from without; so that an assumed external Gospel, as given in the Bible and as interpreted by the Church, was declared to be of higher authority than the natural human reason and the natural moral sense. The punishment of all men because of the sin of one man might be repugnant to the natural conscience, and so might the redemption of the otherwise lost by the death of the innocent Jesus, but what mattered this violation of the voice of God as speaking in the ordinary human intelligence and in the ordinary moral sense if, as the Augustinian theologians held, the supreme utterance of God, as declared by the Church, told a different story from that told by the merely human mind? Had not man's reason and moral sense been incapacitated for true insight by the effects of Adam's transgression? This false opposition and antagonism which the Augustinian view set up between man in a state of "nature" and man in a state of "grace"—an opposition which ignored or invalidated the divine authority of God as expressing itself in the inner life of the individual soul, has wrought injury of the direst kind. It has set up priests as necessary mediators between God and the soul in all the chief epochs of human life; it has stifled freedom of thought; and, worst of all, it has deprived the natural, God-inspired conscience of its intrinsic authority, and has set up in its place a wretched factitious ecclesiastical conscience, so that while the natural moral sense of the Inquisitor assured him that the men who earnestly seek truth and are prepared to die for it are essentially admirable men, his church-manufactured conscience, on the other hand, declared to him that he was doing God service in piling burning faggots round some of the divinest of His sons!

So much for the false and mischievous view of the relation between religion and morals which Augustinianism has worked and is working in the Roman Catholic Church; and now let us turn our attention to Protestantism, for, as we have seen, even Protestantism has not yet succeeded in wholly freeing the souls of men from the baleful tyranny of the erroneous conception that God's chief relation with the spirit of man is an outward relation. It must be admitted that the Reformation introduced the true principle that the soul and God can enter without priestly mediation into direct and vital relations with each other. But the time was by no means ripe for religious thinkers in general to entirely throw off the yoke which the Augustinian dogmas had imposed upon the human mind, and to reinstate the God-inspired human reason and human conscience in that supremacy which was rightly attributed to them by the best and wisest souls in the early Christian Church. The Hebrew and Greek Scriptures were unfortunately placed in that position of supreme authority from which the Church had been dislodged; and though Luther, when he claimed a right to reject the Epistle by James, must have had a distinct glimpse of the true principle that there is in the immediate immanence of God in the human soul an authority competent to try all scriptures, whether or not they be of God, neither he nor his followers had the courage to consistently develop and act upon this principle. Hence the old orthodox doctrines were retained; mere reason and moral sense were again spoken of disparagingly when compared with the supernatural effects of "grace," and the tragedy of the burning of Servetus at the instigation of Calvin is one of the great object-lessons in the history of the Church, which shows conclusively how utterly false and mischievous is the principle which separates God from immediate communication with the individual soul, and transfers the court of ultimate appeal on questions of truth, morality, and religion from the immediate self-revelation of God in man's inner life to any outward authority, be it the authority of the Church or that of the Scriptures.

I have depicted at, I fear, tedious length some of the ill effects of this Augustinian doctrine that God is separate and apart from the natural and human spirit, and that the chief and final authority on matters moral and religious is the outer authority of Church or Bible. Now I return to my earlier statement that, notwithstanding the existing temporary reaction in some parts of the religious world in favour of sacerdotalism, there are, in the present day, the clearest signs that all over Christendom earnest and thoughtful souls are beginning to clearly discern how false and mischievous is this conception of God's relation to humanity which still obtains in the Romish, and in the larger portion of the Protestant, Church; and there is going on around us on all sides a grand re-assertion, in a somewhat new form and one more in harmony with modern science and modern philosophical thought, of the old doctrine of Jesus, of John, of Paul, and of the early Greek Fathers, that the soul of man, so far from being intrinsically corrupt and morally impotent, is in truth both human and divine, that that sublime moral imperative which day by day enjoins upon us to rise above all sensual and selfish aims, and that consciousness of spiritual peace and blessedness which follows upon the free surrender of the will to the divine claims of purity, righteousness, and love, are experiences which afford never-failing evidence of God's inward presence and of His constant self-revelation to, and communion with, the souls of men. Hence it is now becoming universally recognised that both our scriptures and the other sacred scriptures of the world owe what is eternally true and eternally beautiful in them to the same divine light, to the same immanent Divine Presence which, in measure great or small, in form faint or vivid, illumines and guides every rational soul.

One of the reasons which has induced me to bring this subject before your notice is that in all churches and Sunday-schools, but perhaps more especially in our own, this great transition which is now going on in religious thought, and which in the so-called orthodox Churches is showing itself in the decline of the doctrine of the infallibility of the Scriptures and in the insistence on the immediate immanence or incarnation of God in human nature, is immensely altering men's views about the Bible, and is causing the old irrational and largely superstitious reverence and awe for this collection of writings to fade away. And though our own churches and Sunday-schools have for some generations past maintained either that the ethical teaching of the New Testament is always in accord with the natural moral sense, or else that where they seem to disagree (as, for instance, when one of the Epistles appears to sanction slavery,) the Bible doctrine must give way, it nevertheless remains true that even among us, largely in virtue of a lingering belief in external miracles, the Bible is still supposed by many to be an entirely unique book, and, in its moral teachings especially, to carry with it a final authority which precludes all further questioning. Now, however, our younger teachers who read the high-class magazines, and find the Bible treated as only one, though the highest and most precious, of several essentially similar collections of sacred literature, and, therefore, as not necessarily an infallible guide to either moral or theological truth, may very naturally feel perplexed and may ask, What, then, is the ultimate authority? The old Latin proverb says "As many men so many opinions," and our teachers may ask, Does not this hold good of moral and religious opinions likewise? What supreme authority is, then, to be appealed to, now that the Bible has taken its place as simply an integral part of the world's religious experience and thought? The answer to this question is, that numerous as individuals are and various as their opinions may be, they are by no means a mere aggregate of separate and independent thinkers, each capable of forming a judgment on morals and religion apart from and different from that of the rest. The Reason, the Conscience, and the spiritual Emotions which are in each of us, do not belong to any one of us in particular; they are universal, they are common to us all; and they form a supreme court to which in the last resort all earnest thinkers agree to appeal. All the world's literature clearly corroborates what each man's immediate consciousness spontaneously asserts, that it is the same Eternal God who manifests Himself in all men as the light of their reason, the source of their ethical insight, the ground of all moral obligation, the inspirer of all unselfish ideas and noble aspirations. This self-revelation of God in the human soul is progressive, being made in very different degrees of clearness and fulness to nations in different stages of culture and to different individuals in the same nation; but, in spite of superficial appearances to the contrary, the same divine principles are present in either a latent or a manifested form in all men. All rational souls must come at last to see the same eternal moral truths; all alike feel that ingratitude is base, all alike respect the man who manifests in his life moral purity and self-control; all admire and revere him who is ready to sacrifice his own pleasure, his own gain, and his own life for the sake of his family, his country or humanity.

The great prophets and founders of new religious movements are the souls in whom the Eternal and Absolute One manifests Himself in a mode which is a marked advance upon the previously recognised moral and spiritual ideal; and it may be many ages before society in general comes to at all adequately realise the depth, the grandeur, and the infinite worth and beauty of this new gospel of the Eternal Soul of Souls, of the incarnate and self-revealing God. Hence the immeasurable worth of the world's greatest prophets and personalities, and of all those portions of the world's literature which embody and enshrine the divinest spiritual experiences of the divinest men; for these all reveal with especial clearness some aspect or other of the one eternal Father; and all alike bear undoubted evidence of their inspiration and of their truth in the joyful response which they awaken in our higher nature, in the power which they have to kindle in our minds and hearts a glowing faith, and an all-embracing love which we intuitively feel and know to be God-inspired and divine. When the infinite value of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures is discerned from this point of view, an intense reverence for the Bible will once more be felt, a reverence which will be as strong or stronger than that of old, and at the same time rational and in harmony with all that is truest in science and deepest in philosophy; but it will be a reverence which will embrace and unify all inspiring revelations of the Indwelling God, whether they come to us through great books or through great and good personalities.

(To be concluded.)

UNDER THE RED EAGLE.—II.

It seems almost unfair to regard Innsbruck as merely a halting-place on the way to South Tyrol. Yet when the traveller turns from the great mountain rampart, and sees before him the shapely snowy Waldrastspitz it becomes a magnet drawing southward. Innsbruck is, after all, on "the worse side" of the mountains, and that road under the Waldrastspitz leads over "the lowest pass over the main chain of the Alps." It is only one of many now, but it once was the great highway from north to south—from Germany to Italy—the mediæval Roman Emperors' road to Rome—the great road of commerce, where long trains of horses and mules carried the wealth of the south and the east from Venice to the great merchant cities of the north. The names of many places on the way, such as Matrei, Brixen, Bozen, may be found in Kiepert's Atlas of the ancient world as Matrejum, Brixentes, Bauzanum. Along the track we are following how many illustrious men have passed—scholars, artists, emperors, knights, ecclesiastics. To be sure they had a far longer, far harder journey than we nobodies have, who are taken in three or four hours from Innsbruck to Bozen in the luxurious Nord-Süd-Brenner express. The first part of the way climbs steadily between pale green meadows and dark green pine woods into ever purer air. Then the trees are mostly left behind and the rocks gather in. The little Brenner Lake with its vivid green lies in a barren valley, and in a few moments we are at the highest point, and trying to realise that we are on the watershed between the Black Sea and the Adriatic. Just beyond the village of Brenner and Goethe's inn, "The Post," there tumbles down from a cleft a delightful little waterfall that joins itself to our company. This is the infant Eisack that goes with us all the way to Bozen, and three miles farther joins the Etsch on its journey to Verona, where it is known as the Adige. Soon after Brenner we see Gossensass lying below us, and in another twenty minutes or so we are below Gossensass. This little mountain village with several good inns was, some years ago, a favourite resort of Ibsen, and its tiny market-place is called the Ibsen-Platz.

A few miles farther, at Sterzing, the valley opens out into a marshy plain called the Sterzinger Moos, but it soon contracts again, and goes on narrowing till road, river, and rail are almost crowded together, and the cliffs rise precipitously. Here it was that the peasants under Haspinger and Speckbacher defeated Marshall Lefebvre, and at Oberau took prisoners 550 of his Saxon troops, and still this pass is known as the Sachsenklemme. The best description I know of the Tyrolese mode of warfare is in Mrs. Shelley's "Rambles in Germany and Italy"—a delightful book, too little read now I fancy. The narrow gorge comes to an abrupt end at Franzens-feste, where a large hideous modern fortress guards both the Brenner to the north and the Pusterthal to the east. We pass Brixen with its many churches, Klausen nestling under the crags of Säben, the Roman Sabiona, where a nunnery now takes the place of a Rhaetian fortress, a Roman castle, a temple of Isis, an episcopal residence and a baronial castle.

After Waidbruck we soon enter another gorge, where the Eisack, grown to goodly proportions, seethes and rushes and tumbles like a true mountain stream. We have passed from limestone to porphyry with its rich dark tints. Everywhere there is a rich growth of shrubs, creepers and underwood, and trees where there is room for them. We pass out into a vast sunny vineyard, surrounded irregularly with mountains, with an opening to the south. In the mist rises the delicate stately tower of Bozen church. There are fruit trees in the vineyards, and in the spring Bozen rises out of a foam of blossom. The vineyards do not keep to the plain but climb the steep mountain slopes, clinging in terraces, holding on under the crags, persevering on the sunny side even to the woods of oak-scrub and pine and larch. Here and there the luxuriant green of the vine-leaves is shadowed by the dark slender spire of the cypress, and there is one—just one—olive tree by a peasant's house rather high up. We are in the south. Beyond Bozen rises the long craggy ridge of the Mendel, nearer at hand the beautiful mass of the Guntschna-Berg shelters the near neighbour of Bozen the little health-resort of Gries. Between the two the Talfer bed—an enormous waste—comes out of the Sarnthal and conveys the ridiculously inadequate stream of the Talfer to the Eisack. There has to be a long stone dyke, however, between the Talfer and Bozen, and a stout bridge across to Gries, for the Talfer, when the mood takes him, can be a devouring giant. In looking back the way we have come we recognise that the Eisack valley made a sudden bend some six miles back, and we are looking not north but east. And, crowning glory of Bozen, the short straight stretch of valley is finished and filled in, as a background to its luxuriance, with a mighty group of Dolomite summits, peak behind peak—on the left the great back of the Schlern, and on the right the beautiful bare crags of the Rosengarten above its pine forests:—

Far, far around shall those dark-cluster'd trees Fledge the wild-ridged mountains steep by steep.

The Rosengarten lifts into the air a sort of irregular craggy cup which I have never seen without some store of snow, but long, long ago in that cup there was the magic rose-garden of the gnome-king Laurin. He, in an evil hour for his magic roses, carried off a mortal maiden to be his bride. The bride's brother, with the champion Dietrich of Bern, pursued King Laurin to his mountain stronghold, and there they must needs wantonly destroy and trample with their feet and their horses' hoofs the delicate roses. Nevertheless, as evening comes on, and the sun sinks behind the Mendel, we may recognise in the exquisite rose-tints that transfigure snow and crag the traces of the ancient magic, and rejoice that no mere mortal foot can ever quite trample out of existence the roses of King Laurin.

HOLIDAY NOTES: GRINDELWALD.

"ARE YOU Unitarians gentlemen?—then there are reserved carriages waiting for you above." This was our first greeting by an English-speaking official, when the good ship Chelmsford put in at Antwerp. It was a pleasant intimation to the fifty of us who had gathered from North and South, from East and West, and led us to anticipate that some good friend had preceded us to make the journey in a foreign land more easy. We were not disappointed. At Brussels, also, considerate arrangements had been made, and, after lunch, under the leadership of Pastor Hocart, we saw the principal sights of Brussels. The gardens, squares, parks were admired by all. We had ample time to visit the Palais de Justice, the Hôtel de Ville, and the Cathedral. Our only regret was that we could not linger and study the Art treasures of this fine city. But we were bound for Grindelwald, so we had to press on.

Leaving Brussels at 6.36 p.m., we had before us a long and tedious journey. Those of us who were awake saw daybreak soon after leaving Strassburg. Gradually the mists lifted and revealed the fine range of the Vosges mountains, and the peasants already hard at work in the fruitful fields in the valleys and on the hill sides. We were glad to reach Basle, where we breakfasted, and at 7.26 a.m. were on our way again to Berne, the Federal capital. There we had just time to look at the fine view up the valley formed by the river Aar, and the main streets of the town, and then took the train for Interlaken. This section of the railway journey grows in interest every mile we travel. We catch glimpses of the gleaming snow-peaks of the Bernese Oberland, and the vast panorama of mountain and valley, rushing torrent, and peaceful lake produces a feeling of awe by its solemn grandeur. At Interlaken we get a magnificent view of the Jungfrau—"that gorgeous mass of glittering snow and ice," which rears its proud head high above the pine forests, which clothe the adjacent mountains. From Interlaken we travelled by the mountain railway through scenes of ever-increasing grandeur to our destination at Grindelwald. We were met at the station by our kind hostess, Miss Tagart, and her helpers, and received a hearty English greeting. I should require much more space than you can give to convey even the faintest idea of our experiences and delights in this wonderful country. We have during the week climbed peaks on either side of the valley, the little Sheidegg and the Buss Alp. We have stood on three glaciers, and seen the fascinating blue of the ice grottoes; have gathered Edelweiss in precipitous places with the help of a guide, and visited Mürren, the highest inhabited village in Europe, where we look out upon a glorious panorama of snow-clad mountains, and down the lovely Lauterbrunnen valley.

The excursions are well planned, so that as we increase in our power of endurance, we can go farther afield. There is so much to see and do that little time or inclination is left to follow one's ordinary bent. In our party we have all sorts of enthusiasts. There were so many cameras that it was thought advisable to form a camera club. There are botanists who revel in their finds of Alpine plants. There are geologists who can chip away to their hearts' content—there will be plenty of rock left when they have done. Not least, there is a group of efficient vocalists who render great service at the Sunday meetings.

On Sunday, the 23rd, the Rev. W. H. Drummond conducted the service, and gave a beautiful address on "The Impres-siveness of the Mountains." Yesterday morning I had the privilege of leading the devotions, and spoke on "The Spirit of God in Nature." Last evening we had a most interesting conference on Religious Associations for Young People.

Hitherto I have been averse to co-operative travel, but here we are a group of kindred spirits of one faith, under the direction of a kind hostess, and we feel that we are guests rather than members of a travelling party. Our hotel is situated in full view of the Eiger, the Mönch, and the Wetterhorn; and from the terrace, in the morning and evening, we get magnificent effects of light and cloud. On two evenings we have witnessed the indescribable grandeur of the Alpine glow. Every attention is given to our creature comforts. Miss Tagart and Mrs. Rutt are most solicitous for our welfare. Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, who remains with the succeeding parties, has vast stores of interesting information, and is a delightful guide.

If there are any who still desire to join the Pink parties, it might be gratifying to them to know there are still vacancies in the third party leaving England on Aug. 17, and if they apply early to Miss Hill, 13, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, London, they may yet be admitted.

In conclusion, let me say it is one of the most delightful holidays I have ever spent, and I heartily wish that many others could share my joy.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—"JAMES EPPS and Co. THE HOLIDAY HOME, GREAT HUCKLOW.

THE schools in affiliation with the Manchester District Sunday School Association have reason to be grateful to the thoughtful energy of its Committee which has given their members an opportunity of taking a cheap and healthful holiday in the beautiful peak country of Derbyshire. At least, this is the emphatic opinion of those teachers and scholars of the Swinton Sunday-school, who last week had the privilege of giving the experimental home its house-warming. It was an eager crowd, twenty-seven in number, of various ages, sexes, and sizes, that left the Central Station, Manchester, on Saturday week last, en route for Great Hucklow, via Miller's Dale. The reception that the Derbyshire hills gave us might well have damped our ardour, for it was "water, water, everywhere." But we had come out to enjoy ourselves, and no mere rain was going to prevent us from doing so. Still the fact remains that it was a drenched party that reached the Old Hall, the holiday headquarters, and the change of raiment which our wisdom had provided was put into early requisition. The spirits that preside over the elements, however, repented them, and for the rest of the week gave us little cause for complaint. We quickly and gaily made ourselves at home. Some of the luxuries of a first-class hotel may possibly have been absent, yet the Old Hall must indeed have been made to fit our party, so admirably did it answer to our modest requirements without confusion or discomfort. That first night! Who will forget it? Sleep? How can you expect excited young holiday-makers, let loose for too brief a time from the drudgery of school and office and mill, to at once adapt themselves to conventional needs under such novel circumstances? So the solemn hours were amazed by sound of jest and merriment. Here and there forty winks were stolen; but when the new day arrived there were eyelids which the god of slumbers had never touched. Sunday passed quietly. The immediate neighbourhood was explored, and a peaceful hour was spent at afternoon service in the quaint old chapel. With the Monday the real work of the week began, and work it was, for these young men and maidens were determined to make the most of their time. So that by Friday night the district for miles around had been well scoured, and its charms discovered and appreciated.

The main events of the week were two long day excursions. On one day we made our way, with accompanying lunch, along the hill-side overlooking the Bradwell valley to Castleton. When there, we first enjoyed a walk up the breezy pass of the Winnats, and then, as the culminating feature of the day's outing, descended the Speedwell mine. A passage of nearly half a mile through the Stygian darkness of the subterranean canal brought us to the "awful immensity, sensationally obscure," of the "Bottomless Pit," at the sight of which, in obedience to the instruction of our guide-book, we all duly performed an "involuntary shudder." Going and returning we beguiled our passage with song and hymn, to the wonder, no doubt, of the inhabitants of the bottomless regions at such unusual disturbance of their gloomy solitude. Walking home by way of the lovely valley of Hope and through the village of Bradwell, we completed a glorious day. Another all-day excursion took us through the deep pass of Middleton Dale, with its lofty ramparts and castellated rocks, along the smiling valley of the Derwent, to Chatsworth House, where an interesting hour or two was spent. Passing thence through the "model village" of Edensor over the hill to Bakewell, and taking train to Miller's Dale, we thus concluded our round. But all our days brought new interests and fresh delights. Shall we forget one afternoon to Hathersage, with the return journey over miles of moorland and through lanes of bluebells? Or the little run to Buxton, undertaken by half a dozen hardy spirits? There were pleasures, too, nearer home. Grand cricket matches, at which immense feats were performed with bat and ball. And then those concerts, outdoor and indoor, with which each day ended. It was a week of unmixed enjoyment, with much fun of an innocent kind. The old house has not, probably, had such a shaking up for many a long day. The serious side was not lost sight of. Each day began with a little service of prayer and hymn, in which all willingly joined. There is no doubt about it, we Swintonians have fallen in love with Great Hucklow. In comparison with it the charms even of Blackpool fade away into obscurity. It gave us all we wanted—hill and dale, meadow-land, moor-land, flower-land; a very dream-land in the wealth and variety of its wild flowers. It was a great week. And it was with reluctant footsteps that on Saturday, after singing a parting song of "Auld Lang Syne," we turned on our homeward way. SWINTONIAN.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ainsworth.—The induction service of the Rev. Matthew R. Scott took place on Saturday, July 29. The Rev. J. C. Odgers, B.A., gave the charge to the minister (taking for his text "The son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost"), the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., to the congregation. The Revs. R. T. Herford, B.A., T. B. Evans, M.A., S. Thompson, and J. M. Bass, B.A., also took part in the service. Tea was afterwards served in the schoolroom. Mr. Thos. Holt (Walshaw) presided at the evening meeting, and, in a very interesting and rousing speech, welcomed Mr. Scott to his new pastorate; the following gentlemen also spoke:—(For the congregation) Mr. Wm. Hayes and Mr. Walter Brooks, (for the ministers of the district) the Revs. J. C. Odgers, C. J. Street and S. Thompson, (for the North-East Lancashire Mission) the Rev. R. T. Herford, (for the Bury District Sunday School Union) the Rev. T. B. Evans and J. M. Bass, (for the neighbourhood) the Rev. J. A. Lauria, M.A. (vicar of Ainsworth) and Mr. E. Main (Methodist), (for the Sunday-school) Mr. Wm. Sellars and Mr. Thos. Walker. The Rev. Mr. Scott replied in a very earnest and eloquent speech. The service in the chapel and meeting in the schoolroom were well attended, the latter being crowded to its utmost capacity. Songs were rendered at intervals by Misses Charnley and Maud Brooks and Master Basil Sellars, and glees by the choir. After a vote of thanks to the chairman and workers, moved by Dr. Nuttall, supported by Mr. Jesse Hayes, the meeting concluded with hymn and benediction.

Bradford.—Last Sunday afternoon the prizes won by twenty-nine scholars connected with the Chapel-lane Sunday-school, at the April examination, were distributed by Miss Brown, of Leeds. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., president of the school, who occupied the chair, in introducing Miss Brown, said that her kindly services to their cause had done much to emphasise and strengthen the cordial relations which had existed between the Mill Hill and Bradford congregations for over two centuries. On behalf of his people, he had much pleasure in presenting her, that day, with a silver key, suitably inscribed, as a memento of her opening their new schools and Channing Hall, on March 23, 1899. Miss Brown feelingly acknowledged the gift, and after giving the young people present an excellent address on the duty of perseverance, she handed the prizes to the winners, five of whom—Walter H. Barraclough, Susan Greenwood, Isobell Pickthall, Henry Thirkill, and Leo Dawson—had passed with special distinction. On the motion of Miss Collins, one of the superintendents of the school, seconded by Mr. Byron Boothroyd, senior warden, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Miss Brown for her services. Mr. Boothroyd spoke in appreciative terms of the generous encouragement which Miss Brown had given the Chapel-lane congregation in carrying out their present scheme of improvements. Prayer having been offered by Miss Collins, the proceedings were brought to a close by singing "Forward be our Watchword" and the Lord's Prayer.

Cirencester.—On Sunday, July 23, special anniversary sermons were preached, and anthems rendered by the children and choir. In the morning the Rev. J. Worsley Austin preached on "The Man with two Talents." In the evening a powerful discourse on "The Grace of God for every Man" was delivered by the Rev. John Cuckson, of Boston, U.S.A. The following Thursday the annual Sunday-school treat took place at Cleeve-hill Stretton.

Exeter.—On Sunday last George's Chapel was highly favoured with animating and impressive sermons and services from the Rev. H. Gow, of Leicester, who is visiting the West.

Gateshead.—The annual meeting was held on Sunday after evening service. The report, which was a very hopeful one, showed the average attendance for the year ending with June to be forty-four—the number of members forty-four scholars fifty-four, teachers six. The treasurer's balance-sheet showed a small amount of cash in hand. Officers and committees were re-elected. A unanimous vote of thanks was accorded the Northumberland and Durham Association for the assistance given to the church, also to the Rev. A. Harvie for the services he had rendered during the first year of the church's life.

Leigh, Lancashire.—On Saturday last, at the invitation of friends from Monton Church, thirty-six of the workers belonging to the Leigh Unitarian Church paid a visit to the Monton Church and Schools. The party were met at Worsley Station by Mr. H. J. Broadbent, and took part in a botanical ramble, conducted by the Rev. T. Robinson, of Hale. Tea was served in the Monton School, after which a meeting was held, presided over by Mr. Broadbent. An address on "Plants and Plant Life" was delivered by the Rev. T. Robinson, and much appreciated by all who heard it. Short addresses were given by the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A. (Monton), and the Rev. A. H. Dolphin (Leigh), and a programme of music, songs, &c., was also rendered. At the same time a very interesting exhibition of plants and home work was held. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, on behalf of the Leigh visitors, thanked the Monton friends for their kindness and hospitality, and expressed a hope that this neighbourly association between the two churches might be strengthened in the future. The party returned to Leigh well pleased with their first visit to Monton Church and Schools. Friends will be gratified to know that the organ fund at Leigh has reached the sum of £120, and that it is intended to supplement this by means of a sale of work later in the year.

London: Brixton.—The Rev. James Harwood, B.A., who has been out of health for some months, has resigned his ministry at Effra-road.

London: Peckham.—The Rev. G. Carter commenced, on Tuesday last, a projected series of open-air services, to be conducted in different localities in the vicinity of the Avondale-road Church, and on Peckham Rye. The opening meeting, held in front of the school-room, was of a promising character. The singing of the hymns was heartily joined in, and the address attentively listened to. The interest of the occasion was increased by a sacred solo, well rendered by a young lady of the congregation. Considerable interest was manifested in the marriage at Avondale-road Church, on Wednesday week, of Mr. W. R. Marshall and Miss Louie Carter, a daughter of the minister. The young couple have been active workers in connection with the choir, Sunday-school, and Band of Hope; while Miss Carter has won much good will by assistance given as vocalist in connection with religious and philanthropic work outside that of her own church. The bride was led to the altar by her father, the Rev. G. Carter, who also conducted the marriage service.

London: Stratford.—The teachers desire to thank the friends who contributed towards the expenses of the Sunday-school treat, which was held at High Beech in Epping Forest on July 15, and was greatly enjoyed.

Oxford.—On Wednesday, July 26, the summer treat of the Sunday-school of the Church of the Divine Love, Percy-street, was held, preceded by a short service in the church. After tea prizes for attendance since the opening of the school were given.

Poole.—A sale of work and garden party for the benefit of the Church Fund were held on Wednesday week in the grounds of Almondsbury, Parkstone-road, by the kind permission of the Rev. E. S. and Mrs. Anthony, and the weather being fine, it proved a great attraction. The stalls for fancy work, needlework, flowers, and refreshments, were arranged on the lawn, and there were other attractions, which included an art and curiosity exhibition under the direction of the Rev. E. S. Anthony, a musical cantata, entitled "Bubbles," by children, under the superintendence of Mrs. W. G. Gollop, and musical entertainments, arranged by Mr. R. Bilben. The sale of work was opened at 3 o'clock by Mrs. W. Carter, who was accorded a hearty vote of thanks for her kindness. During the afternoon and evening there was a good attendance, and at dusk, the pretty grounds were illuminated through the kindness of Mr. J. Bayley. The proceeds amounted to about £50.

Preston.—The congregation are sustaining a great loss owing to the enforced resignation through ill-health of the Rev. Joseph Harrison. His health broke down about two years ago, and although he derived much benefit from a winter in the Canaries, the respite was only temporary, and he is now ordered complete rest for two years at least. Mr. Harrison has endeared himself to the congregation during his eight years' ministry in Preston, and the utmost sympathy is felt for him and his family.

Sunderland.—On Sunday, July 30, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, conducted two services in the Bridge-street Chapel. The occasion was the reopening of the chapel, after being closed for a fortnight for painting, papering, &c. The services were very well attended, especially in the evening.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—D. A.; F. E. C.; J. C.; E. I. F.; E. G. (thanks); J. C. H. (Leipzig); W. J. J.; E. W. L.; A. W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT is prorogued and we are not yet free from the anxiety that this country may suffer the humiliation, and South Africa the calamity, of war in the Transvaal. A memorial to the people of Great Britain is being widely signed in Holland, from which the following passages, as translated, are taken :—

“We citizens of Holland are akin to you by our common origin, our similar history and traditions, and the same customs and national institutions. This very kinship, of which we are proud, inspires us with boldness to give utterance to the irresistible impulse in our hearts and the deep conviction in our minds that many among you are impelled by a strong desire to commit an act of foul injustice towards the people of the South African Republic—an offshoot of our common stem, a nation weak in numbers, but strong in the virtues most highly prized by all Anglo-Saxons—namely, courage, love of independence, self-reliance and piety. . . . Let this people follow a course of natural growth, guided by the spirit of the age, which must infallibly impel along the road of material and intellectual progress, and which of itself condemns any violent interference as more likely to retard than to promote their gradual development. This we most earnestly pray you—not only because any other line of action must needs lead to violence, bloodshed and fratricide, but also as such action would be an outrage on Justice, cast a blot on the fair name of British equity, deal a blow at British common sense, and make a mock of British generosity.”

THE August Concord concludes its account of the Conference at The Hague, giving also further impressions by Mr. W. T. Stead and by the editor, Mr. G. H. Perris. The report includes an abstract of the Naval Red Cross Code, and of the elaborate Arbitration scheme. Concord's “History of The Hague Conference” is now being revised by one of the delegates, and is to be issued immediately at the price of sixpence.

UNTIL the Bishops take some action with reference to the Archbishops' ruling in the matter of ceremonial incense and processional lights, it is impossible to say what the immediate result may be, but there are loud mutterings of discontent and rebelliousness on the part of the ritualistic clergy. The fact that the Archbishops' decision was based simply on an interpretation of law, determined by a “secular” power, is the great cause of offence, and submission to such a principle is declared by the extreme High Churchmen to involve the surrender of their whole position. Thus Dr. Cobb, assistant-secretary of the English Church Union, prophesies Disestablishment after the next General Election. Writing in the Daily Chronicle, he said :—

To my mind, the most grave feature of the Declaration is the plain proof it affords of the impossibility of securing for the Church the power to live her own present life. The Act of Uniformity is a law of the Medes and Persians, and admits of no sort of variation in the conduct of public worship. Hymns, evening sermons, and organ music must go logically with the departure of incense. Processions, too, are illegal; everything is illegal which was not thought of in Queen Elizabeth's days. When Churchmen have let this fact sink down in their minds, they will either resign if they cannot obey, or obey under protest, and then throw in their lot with those who are working for Disestablishment. From the point of view of those who dread Disestablishment, no declaration could have been more disastrous than that of July 31, 1899. It will most surely tell heavily at the next General Election.

But supposing Disestablishment effected—the first step by which “the Church” would proceed to live “her own life,” would probably be disruption.

WRITING in this month's Contemporary Review on “Race and Religion in India,” Dr. Fairbairn quotes a native judgment on English Sacramentarian religion, which is worth pondering :—

I remember the indignation with which I once heard the charge of idolatry retorted against Catholicism. “We,” said the Hindu, “have nothing so gross in our religion as you have in yours. We make an image or a symbol of our god, but we never confound either with the god it speaks of.

The most illiterate person knows that there is one Vishnu and one Siva, one Krishna and one Kali, and that there is not such an infinite multitude of these deities as there are symbols or images in the land. But you, you take a piece of bread or a cup of wine; you mutter over them a prayer, and they straightway become the flesh and blood of your God, which you offer up in sacrifice and then consume. In all Hinduism you will find no idolatry so gross as this.” The illustration may at least help to indicate the difference between the imaginative East and the prosaic West in relation to the articles and instruments of worship.

Striking confirmation of this judgment the Hindu might find in the evidence given at the Archbishops' recent “Hearing” on the subject of Reservation. The Vicar of Christ Church, Doncaster, in reply to a question whether he reserved in both kinds, is reported, in the Guardian, to have said: “Yes, in both kinds; the Host in a silver pyx, and the Sacred Blood in a silver vessel made air-tight specially for that.”

ONE admirable new departure in the observance of Bank-holiday, which in future years surely may be widely followed, was the throwing open of the garden of Russell-square, Bloomsbury, to a large party of the poorest inhabitants of the district, who could not afford even that one day out of town. Permission by the residents in the square having been cheerfully given for the use of the garden, which is over five acres in extent, and the necessary funds having been secured, a party of 1,100 was entertained to tea in re-lays of 250 in a large marquee, while music, swings, and sports of various kinds, concluding with a prize-giving, furnished abundant pleasure for a long afternoon and evening. The sisters of the West London Mission, under the superintendence of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, who is resident in the neighbourhood, were the organisers of the party. There are other squares in central London, the delightful gardens of which might be so used, not merely once a year, but on other summer afternoons and evenings.

WHO first was possessed by the idea of a Sand Garden for town children we do not know, but it is pleasant to hear that the garden opened last year in Gay-street, Collyhurst, Manchester, is having a very prosperous second summer. A piece of vacant land lent for the purpose was railed in, and three large pens of wood were filled with sand, while spades and buckets, skipping ropes, balls and skittles are provided for the children to play with. The garden is open three days a week, under the supervision of a matron, and is designed for children either too young or not strong enough to go to school or to the parks. From 60 to 100 can play in the garden at once. They have to come with clean hands and face, and in addition to the matron, other ladies take it in turns to come down to help the children in their play. Sand is always paradise for children, but there is also a little strip of flower bed where nasturtiums have been sown, which the little ones delight to water and to watch in their growth. The hon. sec., Mrs. Philip Herford (27, Heaton-road, Withington), is glad to give any information about this work.

THE sermon preached by the Rev. W. Harrison before the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire at Warrington, on June 15, has now been published by Messrs. H. Rawson and Co. (price 2d.), under the title "Unitarianism as Seen from the Outside," and may be had at Essex Hall. The sermon, as those who heard it will remember, was thoroughly characteristic of the preacher, and together with a protest against the insinuations of certain critics as to our supposed moribund condition contained an earnest plea for positive religious teaching and a courageous outlook into the future. The following are its concluding sentences:—

It may be that after all our efforts, in the providence of God, we shall remain a small Church. So be it if God wills. Even then we may glorify the task He has given us to do. Small armies have performed miracles of valour, and more than once in the history of the world, a remnant has saved a nation. Our future is with God; it is for us to be true now and here, and speak without reserve or misgiving the message God commits to our lips.

Let us keep as a city on a hill, clean and bright and beautiful, with gates wide open for whoever may choose to enter; and, above all, let our light shine in good works for the healing of the woes of men and the hastening of God's kingdom on earth, not for any glory it may bring to us or to our Church, but for the glory of our Father in heaven.

THE August number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains a sermon by the Rev. C. Hargrove on "The Old Testament and the New Orthodoxy." Having shown how the old notion of infallible scriptures has been obliged to give way before a wise criticism, the sermon argues that the doctrine of an infallible Christ, as the one supreme authority, cannot rightly take its place, and that we must learn to value the continuous and growing revelation of God.

God draws us to Himself, each and all of us, draws, and drives if need be. Such is the Divine explanation of all history, though it be hard yet to understand. It is true of all mankind what the prophet of old wrote of one chosen race—chosen that in small compass we might more easily read and comprehend God and His purpose—"When Israel was a child," when men were yet wild and ignorant, "then I loved him, and I taught him to walk, I took them in my arms, I drew them with cords of a man with bands of love." (Hosea xi.) This was before ever Christ spoke, or word of Gospel was written. And they who would exalt Christ at the expense of the prophets, who depreciate the old revelation to enhance the worth of a new, do in truth limit and lessen God's universal love; they confine to a Church what is meant for mankind; they assign a date to what is an uninterrupted growth; for the glory of one great teacher they would obscure the Light which has never ceased to shine since man first lifted eyes to heaven.

It is pleasant to hear that those portions of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams' "Notes from Assam," in THE INQUIRER, which describe the physical features and productions of the Khasi Hills, the habits, customs, and religion of the Khasi people, have been read to senior classes in several Board schools in the home counties and in the north of England, and have greatly interested the pupils.

THE little volume of "Addresses, Prayers and Hymns" by the late Rev. Dr. Sadler, edited by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and printed for private circulation, contains ten short communion addresses and prayers before and after communion, an address at a baptism and a marriage address, several funeral addresses, and meditations on "Christian Charity," "Self-denial," and "A Good Conscience." The volume concludes with seventeen hymns and verses, some of which have already found their way into hymn-books. There are still a number of copies of this little book at Essex Hall, which our readers will remember, from Mr. Drummond's letter which we recently published, can be had from the book-room, for the cost of 1s. to cover expenses.

At the dinner recently given to Dr. C. Carroll Everett, Dean of the Theological faculty, at Harvard, on his seventieth birthday, some lines by the Rev. Theodore C. Williams were read, from which the following are quoted:—

Thy patient pen
Among us blind, tempestuous sons of men
(While many oracles were false or dumb)
Watched the horizon whence the morn should come;
And through a doubting generation wrought,—
A faithful priest, true both to faith and thought.

Yet also artist, thou. Thou didst surprise
The souls of men with sacred harmonies,—
Of truth with truth, of doubt with larger seeing.
Of Man's brief year with God's eternal being,—
And thou didst hear God's music holding sway.
O'er Nature's fields of conflict and decay.

Give youth the deeds of war, the flights of song,
Or what brief burst of glory may belong
To genius in a tumult of surprise.
Let mortal men behold with happy eyes,
And all the muses wonderingly tell What swift-souled Keats could see or Raphael.

The Sage has other tasks. His work is done
Not by the morning, but the evening sun.
Let him of Königsberg or Socrates Show age fulfilling wisdom. Ranked with these,
But higher in our love, let Martineau
Give Everett his hand; and let them go Far up the heights in life's last Alpenglow.

THE following verses on "The True Discipleship," by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, appear in the current number of the New Kingdom:—

The Master.

Ye fed me when I hungered sore,
And cooled my thirst, oppressed with heat;
A stranger, naked at your door,
Ye took me in, did kindly greet;
In prison sick, on prison floor
Ye sought me, raised me to my feet;
For this that thou hast done to me,
For this shalt thou remembered be.

The Disciple.

Thy desert-fasting, Lord, we know,
"I thirst," was once thy mournful cry;
Thy homeless way did often go
Where bird and beast more sheltered lie;
A captive bound, it was thy woe,
Forsaken of thy friends, to die;
We know it well, but when did we,
In this thy need, do aught for thee?

The Master.

The hungry poor my hunger make,
And with their thirst my throat is dry;
They me despise, and me forsake,
Who pass them unbefriended by,
For poisoned lives no pity take,
And leave the sick, uncheered, to die;
What thou has done to two or three,
That thou hast done, in them, for me.

THE Free Church of Scotland has lost a distinguished leader in Dr. Alexander Balmain Bruce, who died at Glasgow on Monday, at the age of sixty-eight. Writing in the Christian World, Dr. Hunter says:—

A great man has gone from among us. Professor Bruce, next to Principal Caird, was the man of most commanding eminence and influence in our Scottish ecclesiastical world. His departure lessens most visibly those living forces which have been holding us up and helping us along these many years in the way of a more Catholic Christianity and Church. I do not think we have had in recent days an abler and braver mediator between the old and the new. He had, like all pioneers, to pull down and destroy, but the real purpose of all his work was positive construction. That he had been in his early years through doubt and scepticism and came out on the side of faith into a larger place only added very greatly to the value of his witness and work in Scotland. There is probably no man who has had so great an ascendancy, not only over students and ministers, but over that large and increasing class of educated and thoughtful laymen scattered in all the churches and outside of them all whom we find craving for an interpretation of religion broad enough to include all truths and facts learned from the Bible, from science, and the cumulative experience of mankind.

Born in Perthshire, in 1831, Mr. Bruce became minister of the Cardross Free Church in 1859, and in 1875 was appointed to the chair of Apologetics and N. T. Exegesis in the Glasgow College. The author of books on "The Parabolic Teaching of Christ," "The Miraculous Element in the Gospels," "The Kingdom of God," he was in 1890 accused of heresy in company with Dr. Marcus Dodds, as not sound on the subject of the literal inspiration of the gospels. The accusers failed, however, to carry their point. In 1896 Dr. Bruce delivered a series of Gifford Lectures, his subject being "The Providential Order of the World."

Our deeds still travel with us from afar,
And what we have been makes us what we are.

"ETHICS IN ITS RELATION WITH RELIGION."—III.

BY THE REV. C. B. UPTON, B.A., B.SC.*

(Conclusion).

Thus the old idea of God as a person outside of us, and separate from us as we are separate from one another, will die away. He will become to us the Absolute and Eternal One in whom all we finite and dependent souls have the ground and cause of our being; whose constant presence and living energy is ever being revealed to us in that divine Reason which enables us to rise above ourselves and to share in ever-growing measure the ideas of God, in that Moral Imperative which reveals to us in progressive form His essential character, and in that passion of Divine Love in feeling which we become conscious that we are in sober truth partakers of God's very life. Thus shall we discover that in a certain sense the doctrine of the Deity of Christ and of the Trinity foreshadowed in an imperfect way an eternal truth. But what the creed says of Jesus holds good of all men; for in those elements of our self-conscious life which we feel to be ideal, universal and eternal, we are indeed not simply created beings, but sharers in the very substance of the Eternal God. It is from that divine substance that our finite personalities derive all that is brightest and best in them, and especially that love which swallows up self and unites us all in God. Thus in a very real sense there are not three merely, but rather countless persons in the one Eternal Father.

In this way Morality becomes inseparably blended with Religion; for our moral ideals, and the sense of absolute obligation which attends them, testify to the living presence of God in the soul; while in turn the religious consciousness of personal communion with the indwelling God gives a fresh and quite infinite interest to all our ethical ideas, as being progressive revelations of the character of God. Fidelity to conscience becomes of immeasurable importance, not only because it brings with it the joy and peace of a soul in harmony with itself, but also because, in the light which religion throws on morals, it involves also the consciousness of Personal Sympathy and Communion with that Eternal One who is ever manifesting Himself in the visible universe, but whose highest self-revelations are made in and through the pure and loving heart. Hence in speaking of God the wise Sunday-school teacher will, I think, seek first of all to awaken and vivify the child's immediate consciousness of a Divine Presence. His aim will be to call forth, either through the depicting of his or her own personal religious experience, or through the biographies of heroic and saintly characters; or, in the case of older scholars, through the prose or poetic utterances of God-inspired men, the direct consciousness of the Universal, the Eternal, the Divine in each child's mind and heart. Thus the child will come to know God in the only truly effective way, and will learn to think of Him not as an outward monarch or even as an outward father, but rather as a constant Divine Presence, whose creative influence he recognises in all the beauties and harmonies of nature, in every grand thought and emotion, in every noble personality. He will feel the Eternal to be present and incarnate in his own beloved Sunday teacher just as He was incarnate in, the son of Mary of Nazareth; and in all eyes that beam with true love and sympathy the child will recognise the Eternal God behind. Thus he will come to find God in all the experiences of life, in every form of moral nobleness, in every look and act which manifest real self-forgetfulness. When his Conscience approves any goodness and greatness of conduct, his Religion will discern the divine in the human; and love and admiration for his righteous fellow-man will be blended with a joyful adoration of that Eternal God who is immanent alike in the soul that does the noble deed and in the admiring spectator who recognises its nobility.

Much of the scepticism of the present day arises, I am inclined to think, from a far too narrow view of God, as though He were a kind of infinite human being existing outside of and apart from each of us as we exist apart from each other. We need to say with Diderot, élargissez Dieu; and this scepticism will, I believe, to a great extent, vanish when we cease to think of God in this limited and external way, and when we clearly apprehend the truth that, like Jesus, every man is at once human and divine, that no man is a mere man, that the Eternal Father invades and interpenetrates every individual consciousness; and that, consequently, there is no need to prove or to infer His existence, seeing that He is directly felt as the Soul and Source of all purity, of all goodness, of all real unselfishness. And in reality all effective proofs of His existence rest at length on the personal experience that there is present in our consciousness that which we directly feel to be not dependent and particular, but to be universal and self-existent, and therefore eternal and divine.

The sense of moral obligation, the ever-haunting presence in our consciousness of grand ideals which we are far from having realised, the love which prompts us to sacrifice self; all these form direct and irresistible evidence of the presence of an eternal reality within us which, although it is in our consciousness, altogether transcends our finite selves, and is felt to be not the particular or private possession of any one of us, but to be at once in all men and above all men. This grand and comforting doctrine of the incarnate presence of God in each man's consciousness is, I repeat, rapidly becoming the dominant conception of God in all the greatest religious teachers of our time; but in most of the churches and Sunday-schools it is still held along with a doctrine of the complete uniqueness of Jesus which introduces inconsistency and confusion into this sublime idea of the constant immanence and self-revelation of God in all rational souls. If this view of God's incarnation in humanity be the true one, there cannot possibly be a difference in kind between His incarnation in Jesus and in other men. The Eternal God reveals Himself in various degrees and under various aspects in different men and in the successive stages of human history; but it is inconceivable that He can find complete and exhaustive expression in any human life. It is our great privilege to be able to hold this grand doctrine without any such inconsistency, and to teach that while in Jesus we have the highest and purest existing self-revelation of God as Eternal Love, there are yet other aspects of the Divine Nature which find more complete manifestation in other great souls. None of the mighty prophets and thinkers of the world have lived in vain; all contribute something to our richer and fuller insight into that Absolute Being in whom we all live, and in whose inspiring presence all that is intellectually, morally, and spiritually great and beautiful in us has its source.

All divine personalities, all sacred scriptures, all grand poems and works of genius become intelligible and inspiring to us because the Eternal Spirit who actuated these great creations is living and active in us also. Hence we have within ourselves the key to all spiritual insight and wisdom, and the efficient Sunday-school teacher will not fail to cherish carefully that side of his nature in which he is in immediate relation with the indwelling God, with the Soul of all souls. He will feed the flame of personal religious faith by the study of the great prophets and poets, and by the works of such spiritual teachers as Thomas à Kempis, Channing, Martineau, Thom, F. W. Robertson, and Stopford Brooke, writers who will enable him to vividly realise and interpret the living presence of God in his own soul, that so he may be more helpful in kindling in all his scholars, this same elevating and comforting consciousness of personal relationship with the Eternal in all the varied experiences of life.

LITERATURE.

DANTON.*

THE French Revolution is hardly the ground on which we should readily seek for an example of the interpretive power of love, but such, beyond cavil, is the "Life of Danton," by A. H. Beesly, which Messrs. Longmans recently issued. The author's imagination has first been caught by the colossal figure of the man who created and saved the Republic; with this figure, as his mind conceives and his soul expands to comprehend it, he finds it impossible to associate the savage thirst for blood, the mean treachery and speculation, the mixture of horror and baseness with which the Danton of legend is befouled. To himself, no doubt, the mere incongruity of these elements in the popular portrait is disproof enough: but for the sake of his hero he feels he must do more than believe in him; he must rescue his memory, refute calumnies, explain what has hitherto been ungenerously presented, defend every ambiguous passage of a great and stormy life, palliate, if need be, the faults which must be confessed. Our author sets about his task in the spirit of an advocate: but it is a task for which an advocate is needed. The respect paid in England to admirers of Robespierre like Louis Blanc, the great authority—deserved, perhaps, as a literary critic, but not as a historian—of M. Taine, the tainted sources used by Carlyle, have left on our national mind a sort of regretful assent to the slanders with which the Revolutionary leader who most appeals to our sympathy has so long been assailed. Moreover, though an advocate, we have here no blind partisan. The biographer firmly believes that no better friend to Danton can be invoked than the truth, the whole truth, the truth unmixed with surmise or mere report. Chapter by chapter he turns the clearest light of scrutiny on Danton's five years of glorious activity, and one by one the charges of crime and vice which, like spectres, haunted the shadow are successfully laid. The reader sets out, most probably, with a picture of "the Catiline of the French Revolution" before his eyes — satis eloquentiæ; animus audax, impurus, dis hominibusque infestus; alieni appetens, sui profusus, ardens in cupiditatibus; magna vi corporis; colos ex-sanguis, fœdi oculi—and ends with a thanksgiving that the accusations against a great and, on the whole, a good man, have been (the word is not too strong) refuted.

Long before we come to the allegations against Danton of dishonesty in his accounts, we are prepared to listen with a strong leaning to the defence; but it is not needed; the evidence vanishes before the lantern, and those who most earnestly desire the end of the trial are the friends, if they still have any, of the witnesses for the prosecution. But it is otherwise with the September massacres. A hypocrite, we feel sure, Danton never was: a murderer, perhaps, if in his view the way to national welfare lay through blood, he might be. It is therefore with profound relief that we read Mr. Beesly's review of the evidence, if such it can be called, which implicates Danton in that detestable slaughter. The stories of Lafayette, Peltier, Prudhomme, with anti-Dantonist inventions of later date, are fully and candidly presented; but only to be severally discredited. Some of these stories (such as that Danton counter-signed the apology for the massacres which was drawn up by the friends of Marat in the Commune) admit of actual disproof; in other cases a very high degree of improbability is shown to attach to the hostile account; now and again a witness is put, so to speak, through a post-mortem cross examination, and made to disavow his own charges; until we are left with Madame Roland, "the woman who has inoculated history with its horror of Danton," whose "vivacious spite" has been "transfigured and consecrated by her courage on the scaffold," so that the falsehoods to which she gave form in her prison "seem as though they would never die." She was a lady whose habit of dubbing men of beautiful features and fine carriage with the names of Greek statues, so that Barbaroux and Buzot became Antinous and Euryalus, prepares us for her impression of Danton. "I looked at this repulsive and horrible face, and though I felt that I ought not to judge a man on hearsay and that I know nothing about him, . . . I could not associate an honest man with such a countenance." She discovered in it, she tells us, "brutal passion," "astounding audacity," "immense joviality," "great bonhomie"; but the last two are an "appearance" and an "affectation." "Often have I pictured to myself," she proceeds, "Danton, dagger in hand, hounding on with voice and gesture a band of assassins more cowardly and less savage than himself." We can forgive the grim pleasure with which Danton's biographer demonstrates that the chief charge brought against him by this impartial witness—except the charge of ugliness, which is undefended—would, if it could be maintained, stain the official record, not of Danton, but of Roland.

This single volume of less than four hundred pages is not, of course, to be taken as a full history of Danton's life and times. The author takes for granted, throughout, an acquaintance on the reader's part with at least the main outlines of Revolution history, and with the nature of the different powers, working under such various sanctions, which formed the welter of political movement amid which Danton lived his five years. It would be well in any subsequent edition to add, here and there, a few words for the casual reader, such as might save him the labour of consulting a larger history. To many, no doubt, the Assembly and the Commune, the Sections and the Departments, the Cordeliers and the Jacobins are practically indistinguishable bodies of men, all seeming to wield, at times, the power of Parliament, while at other times they can only vapour and impotently threaten. The key is not far to seek: but there is no reason why it should not be attached to the lock.

Such books as this are very wholesome fare for the student who aspires to a free pulpit. The imposition of historical legend, the fallacy that what is widely believed ought, if possible, to be accepted—that credit is the same thing as truth—is still strong upon all mankind, and seems, for some reason, to be stronger upon the rising generation than their fathers. Yet it is one of the duties of a free church to free the historic basis of its faith from untruth. If Jesus was not born of a virgin, then the million millions of liturgical assertions that he was so born give not one jot of reason or excuse for making one such assertion more. Perhaps no better precaution can be taken against this subtle fallacy than the reading of books which overthrow, in the field of modern history, delusions which are already powerful, but have not had time to become venerable. And the task, in this case, is full of pleasure. From the ordeal of close and continued scrutiny the figure that emerges is nobler, grander, less stained and distorted than the legendary form it displaces. Whatever are its faults, neither cruelty nor corruption is among them. Generous, tolerant, brave, enthusiastic for the people, yet far-sighted and sane, we may receive him back, not without thanks to his devoted defender, into our pantheon of heroes.

THE most attractive and stimulating article in the current (June) number of the New World is that by the Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, on "History, a Teacher of Liberal Religion" to which we have referred more fully in another column. The movement among the Jews in recent years known as "Zionism" is dealt with in two articles. On the one hand Miss Josephine Lazarus of New York writes sympathetically of the idea of founding again a Jewish state in the old Land of Promise.

To Palestine is no backward march.

* "The New World," a quarterly review of Religion, Ethics, and Theology. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co. London: Gay and Bird. To be had at Essex Hall, 8s. Yearly subscription 12s.

Palestine is the highway, the gateway of the East, the opening road to commerce and civilisation, the coveted of the earth. No people save Israel can take peaceful possession, for all the Armed Powers look on and watch each other with jealous eye. Israel alone has no lust for empire or political supremacy; in thus seeking a long-lost home, Israel only would be a spiritual, not a temporal power, the Messenger of Peace to all the world.

So Miss Lazarus expresses the plea of the believers in the scheme, but adds that of course not all Jews can or will or need go to Palestine. Others would remain in many lands side by side with Christians, the two working out their ideal together. "Brother clasping the hand of brother, the Jew and the Christian will be one, even as they were one in Christ, the highest type, the ideal leader of humanity." She does not think that the new state will intensify and perpetuate Jewish segregation, but rather the reverse. "Already Zionism has proved itself (it seems to me) a liberalising influence, inasmuch as it has freed the Jew from his smaller and more personal self, his personal self-regard and insistence, his personal grievance against the world, and opened out into a larger and more impersonal field for action and service." On the other hand, Professor Deutsch, of the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, takes the opposite view, urging the hostility of the great majority of educated and prosperous Jews, without whose support the scheme would in any case be impracticable.

In an article on "Immortality and Psychical Research," Professor J. H. Hyslop, of Columbia University, asserts that the religious mind, which has surrendered belief in the inerrancy of the Scriptures, must choose between science and Catholicism. "It must either fall back upon the tradition and authority of the Church, or surrender to the jurisdiction of science. In accepting the latter, it has no other alternative between agnosticism and spiritism in respect to the problem of immortality." Such a dilemma we cannot for a moment accept. Whatever the phenomena of spiritism may imply, our conviction of immortality rests on far other grounds, untouched by any question of infallible scriptures or tradition. Our reliance is not on the phenomena of "spiritism," but on spiritual insight, which is the fruit of personal religious life.

More satisfying is the article by Professor G. M. Stratton, of the University of California, on "The Psychological Evidence for Theism," a plea for larger and more critical thinking, in which the ultimate conclusion shall do no injustice to any great principle of the mind.

I cannot adore "Eternal Matter" or "Ceaseless Force," or the Unknowable or Humanity, or the Absolute Idea, but only God. Without God the world is chaotic and meaningless. It is unreasonable and unintelligible, as if nothing had a cause, or as if anything could follow anything. Loyalty to our full intelligence, to all those principles of order and reason of which the scientific principle is but one, call us, therefore, to the belief that God exists. So it seems to me that philosophy, when it comes into its full inheritance, justifies the theistic view.

We are glad to find at least one article in this number by a European writer, and that an Englishman. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant contributes an article on "The New Evangelical Catechism," in which he deals with the origin and significance of this notable production, and institutes an interesting comparison between it and earlier catechisms. His criticism of the ambiguity of many of the answers in the new Catechism is of special value, and the article concludes as follows:—

It really must be urged on our friends, and on ourselves as well, that the first duty of the teacher is to be as lucid and straightforward as possible. Strange, and pathetically strange, it is that a duplicity of language which we should condemn in the scientist and the historian is considered not only permissible, but even creditable, in theology. The source of this intolerable evil lies undoubtedly in the desire to include competing theories in one authoritative orthodoxy. There is a better inclusiveness. It is that where all are free to think and free to speak, and yet feel a vital union in religious hopes and aims. We must not blame the Evangelicals for not achieving at one step this higher unity. Their new Catechism will, we suppose, be fairly tried awhile. Some will be content with its haziness of thought, provided its moral inspiration be felt abundantly. But with the most virile minds things will have to be thought out definitely and candidly, and then these flimsy webs of accommodating phraseology will be brushed away. There will be, however, in such a case, no need of rupture in the forces of free religion, in the presence of Sacerdotalism which is the common enemy. It will be interesting to watch the process of conversion to the larger principles of mutual trust, and especially of trust in the free truth.

Among the other articles, that by the Rev. S. J. Barrows on "Mythical and Legendary Elements in the New Testament" should not be overlooked. The number closes with forty pages of interesting notices of books.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE most valuable article in this month's Contemporary Review is the first, by Dr. Fairbairn, on "Race and Religion in India," though it is by no means easy reading. With no light-hearted assumption of superior wisdom, Dr. Fairbairn during his recent visit to India faced the religious problems of that wonderful country, and in the present article he shows how essential are modesty and restraint of judgment in attempting to estimate the qualities of the inward life of a race in many respects so different from ours. Merely to study the literature of the ancient religions is sure to lead to error of judgment, unless the actual conditions of religious life in the present are considered. Great speculative activity, but defective critical faculty, Dr. Fairbairn noted as characteristic of Indian religious teachers; and the speculations are expressed in the language of mythology.

One of the most distinguished of living Hindus said to me: "You people in the West are accustomed to say that the Oriental mind is subtle. It is not subtle; it is really a very simple mind." And he said truly, but not the whole truth. The Hindu mind is at once subtle and simple, for subtlety and simplicity are not opposites; on the contrary, they may imply and comprehend one another. Simplicity may be said to refer to the forms of thought, but subtlety to their manipulation, their analysis and interpretation. Thus a child may surprise us by the subtle reading of a simple phrase, and nothing so distinguishes the childlike imagination as the ease with which it strikes an unexpected truth out of a concrete image. Now, in its form, Hindu thought is simple; it has never outgrown the mythological state. Though the language in which it speculates may be precise and classical, it yet speaks the tongue, breathes the atmosphere, and transmutes into realities the images, of mythology. . . . Hindu metaphysic is the great begetter of Hindu mythology. India is a land in which gods are ever being born.

The article by Kang Yeu Wei on the Reform of China takes us still further East, and is strange and melancholy reading. It leaves an impression of noble unselfishness in the would-be reformers of their country, but at the same time of complete failure. Canon MacColl and Mr. J. Horace Round engage in an encounter (without gloves) over the meaning of "established by law" as applied to the Church of England, and their vigorous polemic is followed by a much more peaceful article by the Countess Martinego Cesaresco on "Nature in the last Latin Poets," giving pleasant glimpses of genuine delight in natural beauty in such poets as Ausonius and Claudian, during the period of transition from the old Paganism to the supremacy of Christianity in the Roman Empire. The article on the "Seven Senses of Fishes" is full of curious observation, and to the ordinary five senses adds an "electric dermal" and "magnetic dermal" sense, to account for the movements of fish in waters where other senses would seem insufficient for their guidance. How far these observations have been subjected to rigid scientific tests we do not know. What is sense and what is instinct may not be so easy to determine.

In the Nineteenth Century there are two articles to which we should be glad to call special attention, that on "The Casus Belli in South Africa," by Mr. Edmund Robertson, M.P., and Colonel Elsdale's examination of the question, "Why are our brains deteriorating?"

Mr. Robertson strongly controverts, and with soundly reasoned arguments, the plea of Sir Sidney Shippard's article in the last number of the Review, and concludes that "however strongly we may condemn the mismanaged administration of the Transvaal, and however deeply we may sympathise with its victims, we agree with Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in holding that there had not been and there is not now any occasion for warlike action, or even for military preparations."

Colonel Elsdale finds reason for the deterioration of the brains of our people in overpressure and the constant excessive demand for receptivity, which must exhaust the brain and take from its creative power. There is too much now to be acquired, and not sufficient time or energy left for original effort. As signs of degeneracy he notes the modern incapacity to attend to long sermons and to read serious books.

The degeneracy is just as marked in the case of newspaper reading as in that of sermons. Tit Bits and a whole flood of similar papers following on the marked success of Tit Bits, are a symptom and outgrowth of this mental impatience and unrest which again they tend strongly to aggravate or to produce. The root idea of all these journals appears to be that the mind of the reader must not be occupied and his attention strained over any subject for more than one minute, or at the outside say a minute and a quarter. The flood of this pernicious hop-skip-and-jump style of literature is increasing to a most lamentable extent. I need not insult my intelligent reader by arguing at length that the net result and outcome of this style of reading is destructive of all real brain power, for which the habit of steady and sustained thought is a fundamental requisite.

The besetting tendency of the day, it is urged, is towards dispersion and dissipation of brain energy, which is diametrically opposed to that steady concentration of mind and purpose which is required for the production of any really eminent and original work. To counteract this destructive tendency, the engrossing claims of mammon-worship must be restricted. Men must learn to be content with fewer possessions and simpler habits, and must secure greater leisure for independent life and thought. Colonel Elsdale thinks that perhaps a great war will be needed to compel men to nobler modes of life. We would look rather for a great religious awakening to destroy the sordid bent of modern life and to open fresh visions of what is really worthy of our manhood's best endeavour.

It is difficult to ignore that of which both heart and head are full, very difficult, very wearisome, very painful, but not impossible. Make free use of the spell. Work, work, till your brain is so overwrought it cannot think, your body so tired it must rest or die. Pray, humbly, confidently, sadly, like the publican, while your eyes can hardly keep open, your hands droop helpless by your side, and your sleep shall be sound, holy, unhaunted, so that with to-morrow's light you may rise to the unremitting task once more. Do not hope you are to gain the victory in a day. It may take months, it may take years. Inch by inch, and step by step the battle must be fought. Over and over again you will be worsted and give ground; but do not therefore yield. Resolve never to be driven back quite so far as you have advanced. Imperceptibly the foe becomes weaker, while you are gaining strength.—Whyte Melville.

OBITUARY.

FUNERAL OF SIR PHILIP
MANFIELD.

THE funeral of Sir Philip Manfield took place at the Northampton cemetery on Thursday week, and was of a public character. Flags were at half mast on the Town Hall, and on the Conservative and Liberal clubs, and the long route from the Town Hall to Redlands and again to the cemetery was thickly lined with people. The Mayor and Corporation were accompanied by Mr. H. Labouchere, M.P., the Right Hon. C. R. Spencer, and many representatives of other public bodies, and of the charities of Northampton, as well as of other religious bodies and personal friends. The service in the cemetery chapel and at the grave-side was conducted by the Rev. John Byles, minister of Kettering-road Church, who delivered a short address, by the grave.

They were all bound together that day, he said, by the common sense of a great sorrow and a great loss. He did not think that there was a man there who did not feel that in Sir Philip Manfield he had lost a friend. It was a great sorrow and a great loss, but he felt there was another side to it, and they ought to be bound together by a common sense of a great gift God had given them in the past, and of the great memory which still remained to them. God gave a great gift to the town when Philip Manfield entered it sixty years ago, although no one who saw him knew it; and by his integrity, uprightness, thoughtfulness for others, and the purity of his whole life he had uplifted the life of that place. Let them pray God that for years to come his beautiful example might be remembered and his beautiful spirit continued in the minds of those who thought of him. It was a great gift to the little Christian community to which he came, and to which he was ever loyal, which he and his had enriched so beautifully with their wealth, but far more than that with the wealth of bright example, Christian spirit, and service of devotion. How great a gift he was to the home and family which was now so sorely stricken it was not for him to say. God had been good in giving them such a life, and such a memory, and all they could do over that open grave was to pledge themselves, in God's sight, and in sight of one another, to live lives worthy of so good an example, and animated by so high principles. Sir Philip had re-joined her who such a short time ago was taken from him, and though none of them could pierce the veil, they were quite sure it was well with them all. The address concluded with some verses from Whittier's poem, "The Eternal Goodness."

Owing to the absence from home of so many members of the congregation, the memorial service at Kettering-road Church is postponed, and will probably be held on the first Sunday in September.

At the close of the morning sermon in Kettering-road Church, last Sunday, the Rev. Alexander C. Henderson, B.D., who was preaching, said:—

"Dear friends,—In the week that has gone by one has departed from your midst who spent his life in doing good. This church, this town, this country, and the world at large, will be the poorer, because of the loss you have sustained. Sir Philip Manfield was a universal favourite. He assisted every good work and every deserving institution in the town. His kindly actions and his sympathetic words will never fade from the memory of this generation.

"The building in which we are assembled is a noble monument to his generosity. For, as you are aware, Sir Philip and Lady Manfield bought the ground, built the church, and presented it to the congregation perfectly free. This is only one out of a thousand instances of the Christ-like actions they performed. Their lives were spent in scattering sunshine, and the sunshine was reflected back again upon themselves. 'When a human being dies,' exclaimed an ancient prophet, 'men ask, "What property has he left behind him?" But angels ask, "What good deeds has he sent before him?"' And our own scriptures express the thought in the following terms:—"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them." May it be yours and mine to follow in the footsteps of such good men, as they were followers of Jesus Christ, so that, when our last summons shall arrive, we, too, may approach the termination of our journey with a calm and unfaltering hope.

'Why should we count our lives by years,
Since years are short and pass away,
Or why by fortune's smiles and tears,
Since tears are vain, and smiles decay?

'Oh! count by virtues! These shall last
When life's lame-footed race is o'er,
And these, when earthly joys are past,
May cheer us on a brighter shore.

Amen."

MR. DAVID JENKINS.

By the death of Mr. David Jenkins, Blaenwaunganwl, the Unitarian cause in Wales has lost a notable and faithful adherent. Mr. Jenkins belonged to a family who have been Unitarians for generations, and who have always been faithful standard-bearers of the faith everywhere spoken against; and our departed friend worthily sustained their reputation in this respect throughout his long life. For many years—during the greater part of the Rev. Thos. Thomas's ministry, between whom and him there existed a deep and lasting friendship—he acted as deacon and treasurer of the congregation at Capel-y-groes. When Mr. Thomas retired some years ago from the active work of the ministry, Mr. Jenkins, owing to indifferent health and infirmities of age, also relinquished the duties connected with his two offices, which have since been faithfully performed by a member of the family. But to the end he continued to manifest the same interest in the welfare of the congregation as well as in that of the Unitarian cause in general. Mr. Jenkins was a man of superior mental attainments, and was a poet of no mean order; and in the composition of an Englyn, a kind of composition peculiar to Welsh poetry, he was almost without a rival.

For many years he acted as guardian for his parish, and it was the testimony of those who had the privilege to sit with him that he was one of the best of guardians. Mr. Jenkins has left behind him five sons and three daughters. Two of his sons are Unitarian ministers—viz., the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, who succeeded Mr. Thomas at Capel-y-groes, but who has just resigned his charge with the object of undergoing a further course of study at Manchester College, Oxford, and the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, minister at Dolais. The large concourse that attended the funeral—the cortège being about a mile long—was sufficient evidence in itself of the deep and sincere respect in which Mr. Jenkins was held by the wide circle of his acquaintance. The service was under the supervision of his old friend, the Rev. T. Thomas, by whom a suitable sermon was preached in the house. All of our Cardiganshire ministers were present, and most of them took part in the service either at the house or at Capel-y-groes.

THE GOLDEN SUNSET.

THE golden sea its mirror spreads
Beneath the golden skies,
And but a narrow strip between
Of earth and shadow lies.

The cloud-like cliffs, the cliff-like clouds,
Dissolved in glory float,
And midway of the radiant floods
Hangs silently the boat.

The sea is but another sky,
The sky a sea as well;
And which is earth and which is heaven
The eye can scarcely tell.

So when for me life's latest hour
Soft passes to its end,
May glory born of earth and heavens
The earth and heaven blend;

Flooded with light the spirit float,
With silent rapture glow,
Till where earth ends and heaven begins,
The soul can scarcely know.

THE INWARD LIFE.

LISTEN to Wordsworth speaking of the brook that the poet and the painter sought :

"If wish were mine some type of thee to view,
Thee and not thee thyself, I would not do
Like Grecian artists—

No Naiad shouldst thou be—
It seems the Eternal Soul is clothed in thee
With purer robes than those of flesh and blood,
And hath bestowed on thee a safer good,
Unwearied joy, and life without its cares."

Then transferring in another place the same thought from one object to all objects, he sees in the whole universe the revealer of God to Man—the great Evangelist to Man.

"I have seen"—the lines are well known—

"A curious child, who dwelt upon a tract
Of inland ground, applying to his ear
The convolutions of a smooth-lipped shell.
To which, in silence hushed, his very soul Listened intensely; and his countenance soon

Brightened with joy; for from within were heard

Murmurings, whereby the monitor expressed

Mysterious union with its native sea.
Even such a shell the universe itself
Is to the ear of Faith; and there are times,

I doubt not, when to you it doth impart
Authentic tidings of invisible things;
Of ebb and flow, and ever-during power;
And central peace, subsisting at the heart
Of endless agitation. Here you stand,
Adore, and worship, when you know it not;

Pious beyond the intention of your thought;

Devout above the meaning of your will."

It is God, then, who unites Nature to us, and directs her teaching; it is His life acting on ours.

But in order to be able to receive her training there must be certain qualities in us. What are these in Wordsworth's philosophy? They are the qualities of the child. The first is the simple heart which loves and to which the world is sweet, it knows not why. We then accord the measure of our hearts to the music of His power who attunes the world to love; and loving things we know them.

Another quality which fits us to receive the training of Nature is reverence, the food and source of admiration. The scornful spirit is the blind spirit and the unthoughtful one; and to its blindness Nature displays in vain her beauty, and Man his wonderful life. . . . But he who bends in loving reverence before the beauty and majesty of the universe, receives its teaching at every pore.

But of all qualities, the two most necessary are purity of heart and unworldliness of character, and in Wordsworth's thought they mingled into one.

What he had unconsciously felt as a boy became at last a conscious possession; he realised that all Nature was one great organic Being, with whom he could commune through the means of love, who directly communed with him, and whose ceaseless prayer and anthem was the adoration and love of God.

Thus while the days flew by and years passed on,

From Nature and her over-flowing soul,
I had received so much that all my thoughts

Were steeped in feeling. I was only then

Contented, when with bliss ineffable
I felt the sentiment of Being spread
O'er all that moves and all that seemeth still;

O'er all that, lost beyond the reach of thought

And human knowledge, to the human eye
Invisible, yet liveth to the heart.

Wonder not
If high the transport, great the joy I felt,

Communing in this sort through earth and heaven

With every form of creature, as it looked Towards the Uncreated with a countenance

Of adoration, with an eye of love.

One song they sang, and it was audible,
Most audible, then, when the fleshly ear,
O'ercome by humblest prelude of that strain,

Forgot her functions, and slept undisturbed.

It is a wonderful picture of a youthful life—this young and solitary creature, living in communion only with the Being of the World, in a world which only lived to him and to God who sees the heart.—
Stopford A. Brooke, Theology in the English Poets.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I WILL keep my promise made last week, and now introduce you to another member of our little household. "Jack" is sitting on the top step leading to the cottage door. All the land, both hill and valley, that spreads in front belongs to him, and he seems to find the greatest gratification in surveying his domain, for he sits for hours, overlooking it with great gravity, and as much dignity as a small white dog can command. He allows people to walk on his grounds, provided they keep at a respectful distance, unless, indeed, they bear a basket, and then he becomes noisy and insolent, and barks loud and long. As the basket carrier comes nearer, so does Jack's voice rise in vehemence, so that, unless we insist on his silence and retreat, our negotiations with the pedlar are conducted with a considerable space of ground between us.

Now, Jack, you will remember "our children" who were here last August? Jack rises politely, and wags his tail with sufficient, but not excessive cordiality, just enough to greet his master's guests.

You will recollect, Jack, the walks we had together last year—and our picnic—and the sandwiches?—and at the words "picnic," "sandwiches," Master Jack's brown eyes twinkle with a most friendly expression, and his tail wags rapidly.

Off he trots to the head of the procession, as much as to say, "Now come with me, put yourself in my charge, I'll show you all the sights worth seeing."

No, no, Jack, I know from experience what you personally conducted excursions amount to. You would scamper over a few fields, and then without any apology for leaving your guests, suddenly dart into a wood, and then would follow a scurrying of big rabbits and little rabbits into their holes, and an excited little dog rushing about after them. Then if we had patience to wait, in an hour, or may be a good deal longer, a tired, dirt-stained, disreputable dog would come out of the wood, and say: "Haven't we had a truly delightful time? Suppose we go home for rest and a little refreshment."

This is a curious old village street we are walking through, the cottages are none of them alike, and are "plopped down" in the most higgledy piggledy fashion. Some front the street, some have their backs to it, and some again are end on to it. Many of the cottages come right on the street, whilst others again are almost hidden away in a big garden. Our village on the whole rather looks as if a humorous giant had said to himself, "Ah, here is a mile and a-half of cottages to be sown." Then, taking his huge pickaxe, he scratched out a long furrow-like road on the hillside, not very straight, mind you, and dipping his hand into an immense sack, labelled "Mixed and assorted cottages," he sprinkled a few by the road sides. Walking on a few strides he sprinkles a few more, and so on till the mile and a-half of road is all "set," when finding that he has a dozen or so cottages still in his sack, some of them rather damaged, he throws these broadcast up hill and down dale. For some peculiar reason our church and schools fly off further than usual, and stand by themselves quite half-a-mile from the village.

It may interest you children to know that our village children who attend the dayschool get a medal if they are never absent once or late once during a whole year. It speaks well for them, and for their teachers too, that many of the children have earned two, three, and four medals, and a certain little Grace has no less than five. That means a good deal, does it not, when half-a-day's absence, from illness or any cause, or five minutes' delay, amounts to losing that year's medal? One day last November such a quantity of rain fell that many of our roads were flooded, and the water in the road between the school and the village was so deep that the farmers had to send carts to bring their little ones away.

I was writing a few sentences back about a giant. Well, there was once a giant really lived in this valley. No doubt there is a good deal of legend and exaggeration in the tales told of him; but still there was a great, strong man. His name was Hugh Hird, and he is said to have once lifted a beam or tree trunk that ten men had failed to lift. Another time he, single-handed, drove off a party of marauding Scots. His fame spread and at last reached the Court, and he was sent for to exhibit his huge powers before the King. Alas, Royal favour did not do him any good, for we are informed that excessive eating and luxurious living brought his days to an early end. We have a memory of him still in our valley, as a mansion and a large wood still commemorate his name.

THE IDEAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION.

"It is a noteworthy experience," says the Rev. SAMUEL M. CROTHERS in the current number of the New World, "to turn from the columns of 'Church news' in a denominational newspaper to HOOKER'S 'Ecclesiastical Polity.' " In the various items of Church news one may find abundant evidence of healthy activity, and yet there may be some lack of a sense of unity and continuity, the dignity of a great work worthily performed, while in HOOKER there is a noble ideal of the Church worthily presented, as claiming the veneration and the loyal service of one generation after another. Such is the contrast with which Mr. CROTHERS opens his striking article on "History, a Teacher of Liberal Religion." Our interest is at once awakened, and it does not flag until we have reached the end of the argument, in which it is shown that there is a yet nobler ideal than that of the great ecclesiastic.

The value of the historic sense is strongly emphasised, and the example of Dean STANLEY is quoted, who "stood always in sympathetic relations with a glorious past," and "gloried in that heritage which his generous spirit always sought to make broader." But among liberals in religion that historic sense appears to be too often lacking, and those who waken to a sense of the need of it, amid a too pronounced independency and individualism, are apt to feel that they must give up their liberalism and seek the shelter of some historic Church. Such, however, is by no means the practical inference Mr. CROTHERS would have them draw.

The thesis which I would defend is that, without giving up a particle of our freedom, but rather by more generously using it, it is possible for us to enjoy the enrichment and enlargement that come to those who belong to a great historic movement. I would go further and say that the tendency of serious historical study is to show that those Churches which insist most strenuously on liberty and reason are in the main stream. The current on which they float flows by the most sacred and the most memorable spots. Instead of seeking an "historic Church," the believer in a liberal religion should seek to understand the noble history of that movement to which he already belongs.

And Mr. CROTHERS then proceeds to show how the historical method, when thoroughly carried out, quickly makes an end of the exclusive pretensions of any separate Church, opening a wider outlook and furnishing a loftier ideal, since "the history of Christianity becomes the history of the gradual awakening to great spiritual facts, ideals, and duties," which can be confined within no ecclesiastical limits.

The liberal minister, so far from being shut off from the inspirations of history, ought above all others to rejoice in them. Let me indicate some of the ways by which he may be helped by the historical habit of mind. In the first place it will help him to understand the scope of the movement to which he belongs. Let him interpret his position in the most radical way. He does not depend upon tradition for authority. He protests against many of the doctrines of those who went before him. He is pledged to intellectual and spiritual independence. He believes in the direct access of each soul to God. Liberal religion is not like the Levitical priesthood, priding itself on its unbroken outward form. It is a Melchisedec "without father, without mother, without genealogy." Very well! but before we jump at the conclusion that it has no historical significance, let us finish the text and follow its suggestiveness—"having neither beginning of days nor end of life, but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually." So far as one believes in a religion that grows out of spiritual experience, he has come to something which through all changes of form abideth continually. We cannot point to any one period and say, That was the beginning of it; for even then it was old. We cannot say, at any time, This is the end of it; for still its voice is the voice of youth and of the morning. If the soul has now any direct access to God, it must always have had it, and that is the supreme historic fact in regard to religion. The spiritual reality must antedate any formal expression of it. . . . The continuity of religion must of necessity be a spiritual continuity. Its line of descent may not be traced by the antiquarian, but by the man of insight.

Thus the members of a Free Church, although their ecclesiastical connections may be of the humblest, and they may seem to stand isolated among the great historic Churches of the world, have really a place in the greatest fellowship of all, and they do well to be mindful of the fact. They stand in the direct line of descent from the great champions of spiritual freedom in every age, and are members of the one great Church of the Spirit. Not with the famous ecclesiastics, but with the saints and seers do they desire, and have they the right, to claim kinship. Heart answers to heart, and spirit to spirit. The boundaries of the separate Churches do not hinder them, but in the Catholic Communion of the children of God they thankfully learn of all who have had insight into Divine things and have manifested graces of the heavenly life; humbly they take their place in that fellowship, yet with a humility which exalts in the sense of a great and sacred calling, and summons to unflinching service.

They who so understand the meaning of religion are untroubled by ecclesiastical anathemas. Others may refuse to learn of them what measure of truth and of divine grace they might have to share with brethren of other nurture; but they will learn of all, even of those who shut them out with the sternest condemnation. By the help of historic insight they may learn to appreciate the different phases of religious development in the past, and so to see into the heart of those forms of religion in the present with which it is most difficult to have any sympathy. This thought is most admirably worked out by Mr. CROTHERS, who traces various stages of development in the past, and shows how it was fear which built the barriers to progress, while only the love which casteth out fear can destroy them.

The religious history for which I plead is something more than ecclesiastical history; it is the history of the actual growth of the religious sentiment. Only in the religious sentiment can it find its line of continuity. It is the history of the desires and ideals of the heart. We must learn to recognise them in their faint beginnings, amid the grossness and wretchedness of primitive life. And we must learn to recognise them in our own day as they overflow the ecclesiastical banks and broaden into the varied activities of secular life.

It will thus be seen how the ideal of each historic Church, even the greatest and most venerable, is merged in something greater, which is the inheritance of those who are content with nothing less than the freedom of the Spirit and the fellowship of all humble seekers of the light and truth of God, and doers of the will of the FATHER who is in heaven.

ONE of the main seats of our weakness lies in the notion that what we do at the moment cannot matter much; for that we shall be able to alter and mend and patch it just as we like by-and-by.—Hare.

THERE is surely a nobler Catholicism than this, one not of Rome, but of man, based, not on the excommunication of the reason, but on the reconciliation of the whole nature, intellect, conscience, heart, will, to God and His truth.—A. M. Fairbairn.

THOUGHTS FROM ITALY.

I.—ASSISI.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.,
MINISTER OF ALL SOULS' CHURCH, BELFAST.

"Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth."—Luke xii. 33.

A LIBERAL Christian travelling in Italy cannot fail, I think, to be impressed both with the marvellous works of Roman Catholicism in the past and with its inadequacy for the present. In these sermons I shall only incidentally touch on the latter. It is sufficiently obvious. Whatever vitality Romanism may have in this country—and it has considerable—it seems nearly exhausted on its native soil. More and more the educated hold aloof from it; and of those who attend its services, many appear to do so rather from habit or a sense of duty than affection. A few weeks ago, in a great Florentine church, where Savonarola used to move a gifted and learned multitude, I heard a priest endeavouring to interest a handful of people without the least visible effect; while in the suppressed monastery next door, now used as a museum, a crowd of visitors, from all parts of the world, studied the frescoes of Fra Angelico. Italy is now weak among the nations. She is enfeebled by division, debt, bad government, and a discredited priesthood; but in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, she was the leading country in Europe, a land inspired by great faith and quick with spiritual energies, the home of many of the fairest of the sons of men; the dwelling-place of poets, artists, preachers, thinkers, warriors, and statesmen. This is the life I want to speak about. I want, if I can, to make you feel how great and beautiful it was, and how religion was the chief secret of it all—as it ever must be of whatever is supremely noble and lovely.

I will begin, then, by saying that religion, by which I mean love for God and love for man as the child of God, in a form enthusiastically approved by the best thought and experience of the time, was the starting-point of the great story of the later mediæval and early renaissance Italy. Christendom had done little for many years, and Europe was full of bloodshed, tyranny, and sensuality, when the Spirit of God breathed upon His Church, and in the hearts of two men of genius who rose up and vowed that there should be a change. One was the Spaniard Dominic; the other was an Italian, Francis of Assisi. Almost simultaneously, at the beginning of the thirteenth century—when King John was on the throne of England, and princes as bad as he ruled many parts of the Continent—they founded their famous orders of the Friars. Their common enemy was paganism in Church and State. Dominic, a scholar, a man of great intellectual force, was roused by the unbelief, ignorance, and cynicism of both clergy and laity. The papacy, then at its height, was little more than a political power which defended the faith by fire and sword. Dominic declared that the evil must be met by zeal and holiness, and the opposing of truth to falsehood. His followers were not to be as the monks, who had ceased to preach and degenerated into hermit landowners, but "brethren"—"fratres" or "friars"—to one another and to the world, preachers of the Word of Life and dependent on those among whom they laboured. It was the same with the Franciscans, only these, calling themselves by the name given to the serfs, Minori, made it their special work to fight selfishness, and were apostles of love among the poor rather than warriors for the truth. They became healers of the sick, in body and soul, in the worst quarters of the mediæval cities. With incredible rapidity both orders grew into vast missionary organizations. They crossed the Alps into France and Germany. As "Black Friars" and "Grey Friars," they arrived in London and Oxford in the days of their founders. In both places the Franciscans settled in the swampy fever-stricken districts inhabited by the poor. In Florence and Venice, and elsewhere, great Dominican and Franciscan churches still testify to the work of the two brotherhoods in the same town. The Franciscans reached Florence in 1212, the Dominicans in 1220, the former making their home, where they were frequently flooded out by the river, the latter at the opposite end of the city. By the year 1300—the date of the story of Dante's "Divine Comedy"—and the turning-point of the Middle Ages—their preaching and teaching had wrought a transformation. Florence "burst out into Christian poetry and architecture," in the work of Arnolfo, Dante, and Giotto, which is still the wonder of the world. Of some of this work I hope to speak in later sermons. What I desire here to emphasise is its connection with the labours of Francis and Dominic. The Dominican church of St. Mary the New (Sta. Maria Novella), begun in 1279, when Dante was a youth of fourteen, and the Franciscan church of the Holy Cross (Santa Croce), commenced in 1294, when he was nine-and-twenty, bear witness to it. If you walk in these great buildings you may feel yet, in some degree, how they affected Dante and his contemporaries. They are very plain, the work of men who had indeed departed from the original vow of poverty, but were still poor and had to beg nearly every penny of the cost; and they were built, it is evident, for a large and humble congregation. The Holy Cross, as we might expect of followers of St. Francis, is the plainest and perhaps the most wonderful. Its roof is like that of a barn, with open rafters. Its floor is of brick. Its windows are of a primitive form of Gothic—merely pairs of pointed slits with a round hole above. But most significant is the plan of the nave and transept. They form a headless cross, like the letter T. That is how the early Franciscans,* and perhaps St. Francis himself, pictured the crucifixion. Christ's head, they thought, was bowed upon his breast in suffering, and nothing would be visible above the outstretched arms. Christianity to them was a message of suffering. The disciple must suffer, and must suffer physically. Without it the world could not be saved. Instead, therefore, of a chapel in Holy Cross, there is a row of chambers or chapels along the east wall opening into the transepts, the one in the centre, larger than the rest, facing the nave, and serving for the altar. These chapels seem to be a little later than the rest of the church, having stone-groined roofs and frescoes on the walls. Perhaps they were built by Giotto, who painted in one of them the story of St. Francis' life, and portraits of the chief Franciscan saints—Louis IX., Bishop Louis of Toulouse, Saint Clara, and Princess Elizabeth of Thuringia (usually called after her birthplace St. Elizabeth of Hungary).

Now Giotto's frescoes in Florence and Assisi are the noblest record we have of St. Francis, except Dante's poem. Dante and Giotto, the two greatest men of their time, and close friends, were born within twelve years of each other, the former less than forty, the latter just over fifty, years after St. Francis' death. They grew up under his influence, knew well the country where he lived, and paid him reverence in their art. Dante sets St. Francis in "Paradise," and praises him on the lips of the Dominican doctor, Thomas Aquinas. From the walls of Perugia, he tells us, we may see his birthplace—a spot on the steep slope of Mount Subasio, where (playing on the word Assisi) ascended upon the world a sun as glorious as that in the heavens, which almost from its rising began to comfort the earth. For, he continues (changing his poetic image), while still a youth, Francis broke with his rich father to marry a lady—a widow since Christ's death—Dame Poverty; and, loving her more and more, he begat a family of sons who went barefooted and girded with the cord of lowliness. I went to Perugia with this passage in my mind, longing to see what Dante speaks of. And from the ancient fortifications, little changed since Dante's day, I saw Assisi exactly as he describes it, on a mountain slope ten or twelve miles distant, its white stone standing out clear in the evening sunshine. I shall never forget it. In a moment I seemed to be carried back into the old mediæval world of the poet and the saint. But of this I shall say something in a future sermon.

Next day I went to Assisi.

Here seven centuries ago, in the year 1181, was born the son of Peter Bernardone, a silk merchant. He was christened John, but his father, who traded with France, and, perhaps, had married a French lady, and encouraged the boy in the French tongue, called him his little "Frenchman" or "Francis." In his youth he was a leader among the young bloods of the city, perhaps wild and prodigal, certainly romantic in temperament. He took part in a scuffle between the men of Assisi and Perugia, who were divided in politics, and was imprisoned in Perugia for a twelvemonth. Later he was only prevented by an illness from following Walter of Brienne to Sicily. It was an age of crusades, love-courts, and troubadours, and we must think of young Francis as full of their spirit, seeking adventure in arms and a lover of the Song of Roland.*

* To a novice that would fain own a psalter the Blessed Francis made answer: Charlemagne, Roland and Oliver, and all the paladins and puissant men that were mighty in war, pursuing the pagans with sore sweat and travail even to the death, did achieve a victory over them worthy of all remembrance, and at the last did themselves die in battle, holy martyrs for the faith of Christ; yet now be there many that would fain receive honour and the praise of men for only telling the tale of the deeds they did. In like manner, even among

* As in Cimabue's fresco in the upper church at Assisi, and that of Giotto at Padua.

Nor shall we understand his religious career except as a form of knighthood. His conversion, his renunciation of the world, his brotherhood, his missionary enterprises have all the wilfulness and romantic daring of chivalry. He had a knight, named after Tancred, and a troubadour, in his first band, which he called his "Knights of the Table Round," sometimes "the Lord's minstrels." In playful moods, so strong was the old feeling, he would sometimes break out into French song and play on his staff as if it were a viol.

Walter of Brienne died of wounds received in battle in 1205; and about this time Francis left home, abandoning his inheritance and even the clothes he had received from his father, to marry "the Lady Poverty," as he said, and to serve his heavenly Master in the lazar-houses. Then, perhaps in search of health, he wandered among the Umbrian hills, in the beautiful soft landscape of Perugino's pictures and the early paintings of Raphael, happy in his freedom, praying to be at one with Nature, and singing to the earth as his mother, and to the moon and stars and living creatures as his brothers and sisters. On his return to Assisi he settled on a spot, a short distance from the town, near a bend of the stream, called Rivo Torto. He lived in a hole in the ground, wore a rough serge cloak tied with a piece of rope, walked without shoes, and did any menial task, such as gathering olives or grapes, or beating walnut trees, for his bread, or, when he could not earn it, he begged it. He thus felt free, free to do good—to nurse lepers, to preach to the poor, to rebuke the rich, to make peace between enemies. His fame spread, and he made his first disciple, one Bernard, a gentleman of Assisi, who had invited him to spend a night at his house. Curious to see the young fanatic at his devotions, he made him a bed in his own room, and lay down to watch him; but to his astonishment the saint went to rest without saying his prayers. In the middle of the night, however, Bernard saw him kneeling on his bed, and heard him say in a low voice, with great earnestness, again and again, "My God, my God." He said nothing more; but it changed Bernard's curiosity to reverence, and next morning he said, "Brother Francis, I am resolved wholly to leave the world and to follow thee in whatsoever thou mayst bid me."

Soon others joined, twelve altogether, and they established the famous settlement on the Porzioncula, or Little Portion—a piece of land, with a ruined chapel of St. Mary of the Angels, near the Rivo Torto, given to them by the Benedictines of Mount Subasio. Taking the triple vow of Poverty, Chastity (Celibacy), and Obedience, and literally obeying the words of Jesus to the disciples, "Sell that thou hast and give to the poor," they pledged themselves to make God their all, to possess nothing, never to touch money,* ourselves many there be that are fain to receive praise and honour only by rehearsing and preaching the works that the saints did themselves achieve." ("Mirror of Perfection," iv., Sabatier and Evans. Nutt: a most interesting contemporary record.)

* "The Blessed Francis reasoned with him [one of the brethren], and did chide him right bitterly for that he had touched the piece of money, and he commanded him to pick up the piece out of the locker with his mouth and carry it beyond the hedge of the place, and set it with his own mouth on the dung of an ass." ("Mirror of Perfection," and to suffer pain for those in sin and wretchedness.

Deus meus et omnia was the first maxim of the order—"My God, my all." The Christian having God had no need of property. If God was his inheritance there was no terror of hunger or death. Having Him he had a Father and a Friend, and nothing that could happen to him from man or beast could be really an evil.

But "the love of God is not idle" ran another of his principles. The religious life was not only contemplation and rapture. It did not mean retreat into comfortable monasteries from the wickedness and difficulty of the world, but conflict with it. "He is not altogether good," said St. Francis, "who cannot be good among the sinful."

And this implies suffering and humiliation in obedience to the cross. So St. Francis perpetually taught the brethren, interpreting the truth in a manner that often astonished them, as it would astonish many who think they are good Christians now.

One day he was walking to Assisi from Perugia with a brother Leo. It was wet and bitterly cold, and by road the distance is fifteen miles. With characteristic cheerfulness, and let it be noted, good humour—humour in some form or other is invariably found in very great men—he turned the conversation to the subject of joy. "What is perfect joy?" he asked of his companion, who was trudging through the mud in front of him. "To be a saint?—No. To work miracles?—No. To know all tongues and sciences, and the virtues of all herbs?—No. To preach so as to move infidels?—No. What then? Why, to arrive home wet through and covered with mire, and to have the door slammed in your face as though you were a beggar or a thief, to be insulted and struck on the head and rolled in the snow, and—here the humour passes into noble spiritual earnestness—to feel something of the pain of the blessed Jesus without impatience or reproach. That is perfect joy."

Fine words, we may be tempted to say; but with St. Francis, I believe, they were serious truth. His happiness and his wretchedness were almost wholly from within. The condition of his soul, not his circumstances, determined whether he was glad or miserable.

For instance, having once harboured an evil thought unjustly of his disciple Bernard, he could find no peace until he had thrown himself on the ground, and made his wronged friend trample upon his throat and face. From such an incident we may gather some idea of the happiness he could feel in suffering for the good of others.

Innumerable stories are told of his love. He literally interpreted the Gospel as for "all creatures." Birds fed from his hand. He could make them sing to him. His words about the skylark are like the poem of Wordsworth: "When she soareth she doth praise God right sweetly, even as the good religious doth look down on earthly things, whose conversation is evermore in Heaven, and whose intent is always toward the praise of God." Rabbits and hares would come to his feet as he sat quietly in the woods. He tamed a wolf. In Rome, as a protest against her lordly, worldly spirit, he led a lamb through the streets. Once as he lay asleep a child tied himself to his girdle. "God," he said "was so courteous," sending rain and sunshine to the evil as well as the good; and in courtesy, in defiance of the brutal laws against criminals, he sent wine and bread to a gang of starving robbers.

Very significant for its influence on Christian art, and particularly on Dante and Giotto, is his love for Nature. He rejoiced in the sun and the moon, and the stars, the sky—in "cloud or clear"—the trees, the water,† flowers,‡ rocks, and—of great interest to the student of Dante—in fire. So beautiful did he think a flame that he always let a lamp or candle burn itself out. He had not the heart to extinguish it.§

Such a life "falls like a stream of tender light across the darkness of the time." No doubt it is easy to criticise it. St. Francis was a visionary and very superstitious. Probably we could not accept many of his opinions. His insistence on celibacy was a very great mistake. He did not see that money, whatever its evils when unjustly distributed, was a gift of God to be righteously disposed, not abolished. We may find fault with him for too literally obeying Jesus, as if to copy him rather than to live in his spirit were the duty of the Christian. Sometimes, it must be confessed, his actions, as Hallam says, were hardly those of "a sane mind." But, when all is said, his character stands out among the noblest in history. Judged according to the ideas and sentiments of his own age, he is perhaps as near Jesus as any character in Christendom; while his grand earnestness, his mighty trust in God, his love for his fellow-beings are the secret of spiritual power in every age. When posterity shall judge us we shall be found to have our absurdities and fanaticisms—or, what is far worse, our drowsy, lazy pieties—and I fear we shall have little to show comparable with his spiritual insight and regenerating passion.

Ten years after the founding of the order, in 1219, he summoned a great assembly of the brothers at the Porzioncula. Five thousand were present. They took a resolution to evangelise the world. From Assisi they set out in small companies, north, south, east, west; and St. Francis himself undertook the hardest task—the conversion of the arch foe of Christendom, the Sultan. They parted to meet again in Heaven, St. Francis expecting, hoping, to die a martyr. He stood before the Sultan and offered to go through fire to prove

† "Whosoever he did wash his hands he would make choice of such a place as that the water which fell should not be trodden by his feet." (Ibid, cxviii.)

‡ "He told the brother that did the garden not to dig the whole of the ground for eatable herbs only, but to leave some part to produce the brethren flowers, for the love of Him who is called 'the Flower of the Field' and 'the Lily of the Valley.'" (Ibid.)

§ When St. Francis was about to be cauterised on the cheek to draw the inflammation from his eyes, "we that were with him," says Leo, "did flee away for pity"; but he addressed the hot iron: "Brother Fire, noble and useful amongst other created things, be gracious unto me in this hour, seeing that of old I have loved thee, and yet will love thee, for love of Him who did create thee." ("Mirror," cxv.)

his faith. But he failed. He returned to Europe disappointed, weak in health, and his eyesight ruined. Yet in 1221 he founded the third order (the second order for women had been established under St. Clara in 1212) for lay people, married as well as unmarried, which by its three vows (1) to bear no arms except in defence of Church and country, (2) to take no oaths, and, (3) to help the poor, struck at the root of the fealties and class distinctions of the feudal system and prepared for a new era. This last work of St. Francis was probably the greatest. It made missionaries of queens and kings, including Elizabeth of Hungary and the great Louis IX. of France.

In 1224, worn out by fatigue and growing blindness, St. Francis retired to a cell on Mount Alverna, nursed by four brethren, who afterwards told how he would lie in the open air in silent thought or conversing with the birds and the lizards that came fearlessly about him, and how, such was his piety, marks appeared in his hands and feet and side like the wounds of Jesus! He recovered sufficiently to return to the Porzioncula and to make several missionary journeys riding on an ass; but in 1226 his infirmities were so increased that he was told he would die. On hearing this he said, "Welcome, Sister Death!" In October he passed away, aged forty-five. According to his instructions he was taken into the town and buried on the hill of execution among malefactors.

The visitor to Assisi may still see the Porzioncula. The chapel and cell of St. Francis are covered by a great church which encloses them. In the cloister-garden the thornless roses, which his disciples took as a symbol of his gentleness, are sacredly cultivated by the few monks allowed to remain there. An hour's walk up a steep white road leads to the town. At one edge of it stands a tall two-storied Gothic church, one of the earliest and most interesting Gothic churches in Italy. It was built by a Northern architect—of whom I shall speak again—over the saint's grave, through the offerings of lovers of St. Francis in many parts of Europe. Within the lower church, above the tomb, is a large stone roof richly painted on its inside by Giotto. In its four panels he has told the story of the Franciscan vow, after suggestions, it is said, of Dante; and in one of these, climbing the difficult hill of the pure in heart who shall see God, he has set Dante himself.

Here is the central spot of Mediæval Christianity, one of the holy places of the earth.

THE happiest heart that ever beat

Was in some quiet breast

That found the common daylight sweet,
And left to heaven the rest.

OBJECT AND METHOD IN SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHING.*

BY THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

HAVING pictured at the outset an earnest young teacher who, conscious of some object in his daily work, wakes up, through partial failure, to the fact that he really does not know, but now sincerely wants to know, what object he has in his Sunday-school teaching, Mr. Wright said that one very definite and worthy object was to educate the children for future membership in the congregation. Yet there was a more immediate object than this, and the lecturer continued:—

Preparation for membership in the congregation may take years. Meantime life is going on. And there is a character being made or marred in each boy and girl every week—every day. Here there is unique work for the Sunday-school. Its speciality is character-building. We have schools of music, schools of painting: the Sunday-school is the school of character. A constant and an essential object of the Sunday-school teacher is the building of character in young people. Books, knowledge, facts, illustrations, are only material and scaffolding, of use only in the Sunday-schools as they go to build up character. It is the possible manhood and womanhood of his scholars that the Sunday-school teacher should always keep in mind. An admiration for the good, a fine regard for the truth, a love of duty—these are some of the things which Sunday-school lessons and teachings should excite and inspire. As you see, it is character—it is character-building all the time.

But now please notice that not even yet have we reached the most important object which may be aimed at in Sunday-school teaching. The supreme thing has not yet been named. What is it? In order most vividly to realise what this supreme object of Sunday-school teaching is, let me ask you now to think of the actual boy or girl who meets you in class. Look at him as he really is—flesh and blood, mind and soul. Take it for granted, as you safely may, that he loves the good and not the evil, that he would like to be good, that he does try! Why should he not? It would be unnatural if he didn't! For you must not forget the elementary fact that your actual boy, though bodily he belongs to nature, yet spiritually he is, even he is a child of God. And that in no figurative sense. Really and essentially he is a son of God. That is, he is spirit of God's spirit. Descended from God, so much God out of God—however hampered by body or hindered by environment—that boy, and every boy and girl, is of divine origin and descent; and hence his love of the good when he sees it, his admiration for noble deeds of duty when he hears of them, his faith in glorious possibilities—all these things are natural to him, because he is essentially divine.

But there are two other elementary facts to be remembered about your actual boy or girl.

(1) His character is necessarily imperfect, in that he is only just beginning to make it; not bad, you observe, but imperfect. What a rough block of marble is to the statuary to be made out of it, so is this young consciousness to the personality it will some day be. Out of all the past, and from God, this boy has only recently received a life—his life—himself, and he by no means understands it yet—much less does he know what to do with it.

(2) And unlike the boy Jesus but like the boy Samuel, this boy may not yet "know the Lord." Though a nature divine is his, though heavenly instincts are in him, the ordinary boy or girl cannot know without teaching what his highest nature relates him to and implies. This may be true, though all the time he or she, under the training of parents or others, is, on the whole, obedient, faithful, truthful, kindly.

Look again now at the actual boy or girl in your class. Think of him or her as they will be on Monday and Tuesday, and through the week, in their homes, in the streets, at their day-school, or in their workshop. Think what a week's life means to these boys and girls, the push and pull of it all, among all kinds of companions, among all sorts of men and women. It is fairly easy for young human nature to be good in good company. It is not hard to be not evil in easy circumstances. Boys and girls in their homes, with their parents, are, as a rule, kept from serious evil. They are surrounded by an authority, a love, a law of suggestion, a spirit, which, as a rule, are in favour of the good. It is somewhat the same when those boys or girls are with you as their teacher, whether in class or otherwise. Their surroundings support and vitalise the good that is in them.

But follow this boy through his work on Monday—this errand boy, this office boy, this mill boy, this pit boy. Follow this shop girl, this mill girl, this warehouse girl. Note how changed are their surroundings then. Many a Sunday-school teacher would scarcely know his scholars if he saw them amid their every-day surroundings. They are so altered, they look like a picture out of its frame and in an unusual place. Mark you, I do not mean to say that in passing from their homes and Sunday-schools these boys and girls necessarily enter into evil surroundings. By no means. Shops and mills and offices and other such places are centres of hard work, not centres of evil. There is often no time for either good or evil in them. But my point is this: that your boy or girl hasn't got you, hasn't got teacher or parent with him when he goes out into the busy world. He goes alone, alone into new surroundings—into glorious, into terrible possibilities. And he carries with him into those new surroundings just what he is. So much character as he has is now going to be tested. Human forces, such as he has never dreamt of, will play upon his young life on all sides to try him. And remember he is alone. He is out of the haven, on the open sea.

This may be just at a time, too, when there are natural forces waking up within himself which surprise him, which he does not understand, which he hardly knows what to do with or how to manage. And the same thing is true of your girl. Think of this young life—this dynamo—this more than dynamite of possibilities! Our noblest citizens, our vilest criminals, are made out of such lives! Follow your boy, your girl, into shop, and office, and mill, and pit, and other workplace. I have said the best word I can of these places. But when you have said your best you are bound to say—if you know what you are talking about—that in these places, where all sorts and conditions must congregate, there is evil, danger, temptation, trial, such as boy or girl never met with in home or school. The moral temperature is never high; too often it is very low. And the great law of suggestion—that law which works through words, looks, customs, conduct, surroundings, calling up in our natures, and setting in operation, trains of impulses, ideas, actions—that law of suggestion is always at work in these places too, and too often on the side of what is downward rather than upward.

It is in the midst of these surroundings—surroundings which do not help him—that our ordinary boy, within a few months or years at most, has got to settle for himself the momentous issues upon which all his future and character, and his share of the moral soundness of the world depend. To put it more definitely:—Is he going to be honest? Is he going to be pure? Is he going to be trustworthy? Is he going to be diligent? Will he be sober? Will he keep a clean mouth and a clean mind? Shall there be reverence in his soul? Will he hold his character as his dearest treasure? I will not ask the opposite questions. But, as I myself have passed all through this, you will see that I know, and you will believe me when I tell you that every boy and girl on leaving the home-nest for shop and mill and other ordinary workplace has got, in some fashion, this moral battle to wage. Picture him or her, I pray you, for the first time in the thick of it. Sobriety, honesty, purity, reverence, assailed sometimes in shocks of moral surprise, more often in the daily downward tendency of his new surroundings. A young moral existence in the midst of all this, how shall he stand? what will help him? what will give him power to resist? Or, if he fail in the first encounter, what will restrain him from falling utterly? what will bring him to himself again?

That is the moral battle of every boy and girl, every young man and young woman. It is being fought out to-day—even while we are here—in thousands of young hearts. To me there is nothing more momentous, because on this battle depends not only their future, but the future character of the world. Yes, your boy and girl, the boy and girl in your class or home, goes out to face this character-making or character-ruining battle. To conquer or be conquered he goes, and you cannot go with him. The time has come when, in the order of God's providence, this young life must go alone and fight a lonely battle. But the thought of you goes with him. And all that you have done for him, all suggestion and ideal of goodness you have given him now goes with him, is part of him. But is that enough? It is—oh, so much!—that which you have done for him, that which you have been to him. But is it enough? I think not. I know it is not.

What then? Besides all this, believe me, there is needed a something not easy to phrase, but what I will call a sense of God—what in olden phrase was called “the fear of God which is the beginning of wisdom.” Nothing less than a sense of God is needed in each young soul which goes out into the world, if it is to conquer and not be conquered; if it is not only to reach the full measure of its personality among men, but to have the blessed life of conscious relationship with its Father in heaven. Yes, a sense of God will uphold it, give it power, restrain it, exalt it, give it dignity and humility. “The sense of God,” that is the secret of self-government, the spring of highest human character, the source of noblest strength, and in varied measure, in due order, this sense of God is needed alike in young and old. As you see, I make much of this. And you will find it on analysis, and more, especially by experience, to be the root of the whole matter. That is why I have spent so much time in trying to show you, in attempting to make you feel, that, to cultivate this sense of God in young people, by our Sunday-school teaching, is an Object which underlies those other Objects, already named, of character-building and of preparation for membership in the congregation. Indeed, were I asked to tell in one sentence what is the object of Sunday-school teaching, I should at present say: “To cultivate the sense of God in young hearts and minds, with all that this implies.” Note that I say to cultivate. The sense is there, of course, in every human child, as is the sense of time and space, of music or numbers, of admiration, justice, or love. There, in the child, or we could never put them there. To awaken these senses, to call them up, to exercise them, to develop them—that is what man can do. And so with this deepest sense of all—this sense eternal—this sense of divine relationship between a human child and a great Father—in some young souls it is wondrously vivid and lovely, in others it is variously dim and crude, but in all it has to be cultivated. And hence the Sunday-school has no higher object than the wise and reverent cultivation of this sense of God in young hearts and minds.

Perhaps I ought here to guard you against one possible mistake of my meaning. I do not plead for the cultivation of this “sense” in young people merely as regulative—merely that the sense may be “a regulator” of their moral conduct. Had I time I should endeavour to show and illustrate the fact that this vital relationship between a young soul and its God may begin with a sense of dependence, then grow to a sense of responsibility, and then rise and ripen into a sense of love. But the unfolding of all this would take another lecture. Suffice it now to say that though the religion of a child, a boy, a youth, and a man cannot be the same, yet in each and all it is a tie, a bond, a touch, a relationship between a human spirit and the Divine Spirit. And, oh! what a gain it is if this sense of God awakes in childhood, and if, when it awakes, it beholds God in His Goodness. “It is in childhood,” says Richter, “that the Divine is born within the human.” “How can you plant the holiest more fitly than in the holiest time of innocence, or that which is to have influence for ever, better than in this period of life when nothing is forgotten.”

For those that are in earnest there is no failure. No work truly done, no word earnestly spoken, no sacrifice freely made was ever made in vain. In dreary moments be merciful and gentle, and force yourself to abound in little services for others.—Robertson.

AN ENGLISH SUMMER DAY.

STEADILY, through the morning hours, the rain falls, cleansing the air of dust and all defiling things. It falls in direct lines, undisturbed by any breeze crossing its downward way. The ground freshens under the ceaseless flow of drops from the grey clouds overhead, and gives off that fine, just perceptible earth-fragrance which makes it so good to be out of doors in the rain. At mid-day, a growing sense of light, increasing from above, makes itself felt, and the sound of myriads of descending drops grows fainter and then dies away. The sun, though still unseen, reaches through the cloud-filled sky with strong, resistless rays. The moist earth welcomes the warm, glowing light; the mists and brooding vapours give way, suffused with its pervading beams. The far distances of the landscape emerge, and it becomes possible to see the hills away off in the south and west. At length the trees begin to throw shadows on the ground; rain-drops on the leaves glisten; the sheen of the grasses grows brighter. Then at last the sun breaks forth in its strength; everything yields to the overflowing light, and all the earth is once more gay. A blackbird's note, mellow and softened, as if sung from afar, comes from among the trees. The great rooks sail over and call from the higher reaches of air in that harsh voice of theirs which has so little music and so much defiance in its tone. A few minutes more, and myriads of insects are out from their hiding-places, crossing each other in the light-filled space. A quiet wind stirs among the damp trees, shaking the round bright globes from their branches, and bending the pliant grass-blades heavy with the morning's rain.

Now, through the long slow hours till sunset, the day will be strangely glad, and all things that love their life will crowd the moments with joy. In the cleansed air and on the softened ground hosts of living creatures will find their heaven of short unsullied happiness, free from all dreams of sorrow or of death. Fields and hedgerows and woodlands throb and pulsate with the passion of manifold life. Over all stretches the immense quiet of the sky; the broken clouds gather in groups and brood motionless between earth and heaven.

Days such as this are among England's perfect days. To be alive and idle for enjoyment and receptiveness of all the day is offering becomes a sort of luxury of duty. Care and arduous toil seem put aside as things for which there is no place in such a world while hours like these glide past. To have to think of men and women and young children shut away in cities where so little of the real day may come is perhaps inevitable. Yet some one must be here to behold and enjoy and, if possible, bear witness of, the splendour and serenity of the day. Some one, whom neither ambition nor necessity has mastered and bound down, must escape the houses and the streets, and be willing to accept this gift of Nature and of God, offered thus “without money and without price.”

Come, stray along this path by the oat-field on the slope of a low chalk hill-side. The great afternoon heat is waning, and a sense of something both physically and spiritually perfect in the conditions of life, steals in upon the soul. Just to breathe the air and look out over the fields is enough. How rested and yet exhilarated is the sense of sight! How well the colours and forms of things meet the eye's longing and love for beauty! There, crowding in among the dark green stems of corn, are the bright red poppies and the yellow charlock—to the farmer, indeed, unwelcome pensioners of the soil, stealing from it their share of its life-giving strength, leaving so much less for his crop of oats. But these are here as Nature's protest against exclusive ownership—to bear witness that none may claim for himself entire possession of a single field, and to declare that man is not meant to live by bread alone. The colours, blending here so well, are Nature's finer gift, which the mind may accept with joy. Beauty is given away along with use which has to be paid for.

One harvest from thy field
Homeward brought the oxen strong;
A second crop thine acres yield,
Which I gather in a song.

And now the sun-rays sink to the level of the higher ground toward the west, and a growing stillness in the air brings on the thought of night. No night will come; only a deeper coolness in the air and a faintness in the glow of light along the northern sky where the sun has dipped down for a little while. And then there will follow the wonder and strange sweetness of the dawn—the new, fresh life which comes with the new day; and which is not new but old as Nature, and yet for ever lovely and for ever suggestive of hope and renewal in the heart of man. W. J. JUPP.

UNDER THE RED EAGLE.—III.

It is the pride of Bozen that the town has ever been a strong bulwark of the German nationality against the foreign element to the south. Welsh Tyrol they call it (foreign Tyrol); we call it Italian Tyrol. In the beautiful spacious Johannisplatz there is a fine statue, by the late Heinrich Natter, of the Minnesänger Walther von der Vogelweide—Walter of the Bird Pasture—who was by birth a Tyrolese, and a most thorough German and imperialist. Some of his tirades against what he considered the wickedness of the popes of his day seem to anticipate Dante. It is long since I saw some of his poems translated into modern German. I remember being delighted by a reference to a flower which is very common about Bozen, the small pink heather—erica carnea. It comes as early as January in some corners of the pine woods, and is quite the first blossom to appear. If I remember right, Walther von der Vogelweide says that as this flower bravely shows itself, while all the rest of the world is dull and dead, he will take it for his symbol and resolve on courage and cheerfulness in the darkest times. This fact of the German feeling in Bozen brings me to a difficulty. It is well known that the common tendency of the German national movement in Austria is towards free thought and detachment from the Church. Bozen has a name for progress and open-mindedness, and yet how can one live in Bozen for a day without feeling the intense religious life of the place? The church is crowded, the pious symbols abound on every street corner or mountain track, the priest—often peasant-born—is the friend of hundreds of families where his presence is needed in every crisis of joy or sorrow. This is puzzling to a stranger in “a foreign land,

Of which, though there he settle young,
A man will ne'er quite understand
The customs, politics, and tongue.
The foolish hie them post-haste through,
See fashions odd, and prospects fair,
Learn of the language, 'How d'ye do,'
And go and brag they have been there.”

Now I hope my position as to South Tyrol is not quite so superficial as the latter case, but it is far less favourable than the former. So please take my impressions for what they are worth, and don't be surprised if my conclusions turn out rather astray from fact. This is my conclusion as to the varying aspect of thought and religion in Bozen. The peasants are as deeply and passionately attached to the Church as any community in Europe, but with the Bourgeoisie the case is very different. They have a daily paper called the Bozner Zeitung which has been condemned and forbidden to the faithful by the Bishop of Trent, in whose diocese Bozen is.

This prohibition is boldly and defiantly printed in every number of the Zeitung, followed by an appeal to every German and lover of liberty to patronise the paper. What the offence of the Zeitung is I can't say, as the political articles are beyond me both in matter and language. But, last summer, I hear, the priests convoked an assembly of the people for miles round to make a solemn protest against the Bozner Zeitung, and the peasants gathered literally in their thousands, and, as many as could enter, in the church, and the rest outside, testified by their presence against the offending print. Much to the credit of all concerned there was no disturbance. Bozen has another daily paper, the Bozner Nachrichten on the side of the Church, spoken of by the profane as the Sexton's Daily. But we must not turn away from Walter's statue without remembering Longfellow's lovely poem on his tomb, which is too familiar to quote. Round the head of this lover of birds pigeons hover constantly. The statue stands above a fountain fed by swans and guarded by lions in the midst of the great square.

It is not too formal a square; the houses are varied and for the most part picturesque. Their line is broken in one part by a long garden wall overhung with greenery. Part of the church only is seen—the east end with the beautiful late Gothic open tower. You get glimpses of the great bells swinging on high, or, when they are silent, of the unromantic figure of the tower-keeper in his shirt sleeves smoking a pipe. On Sundays the splendid military band plays—the band of the 14th Regiment—the best in Austria. May they continue their quarters in Bozen barracks for many years! All the little world of Bozen walks about under the trees and listens to Mozart, Wagner, and Strauss. The concert finishes before twelve, when the bells send forth their call to the devout, and the peasant removes his hat, and his wife crosses herself. On a market day, when the square is full of peasants, the sudden hush at this call to prayer is very impressive. Face to face with the Tyrolese peasant, his conservatism, his kindness, simplicity, and piety it is difficult to remain a stout, unflinching advocate of “Progress.” It appears rather inevitable than desirable. I recall a little incident many years ago at Pisa. It was at the railway station, and the old rules were relaxed that kept the traveller a prisoner in a stuffy waiting room—the platform was free. However, the anxiety of a very old porter to keep me a prisoner, as in the good old times, struck me as so pathetic that I submitted. Meanwhile a young Italian thrust the old porter aside with scant courtesy, and gained the platform. The porter was indignant. “What would you have?” said a younger porter, “that's Progress!” “Progresso,” shouted the old man in a rage, “Progresso è Regresso!” He was in the wrong, no doubt, at any rate in that instance, but the phrase has stuck in my memory, and recalls itself every now and then. I recall it often in Bozen. J. WILSON.

OUR SEASIDE HOME AT SOUTHEND.

THE London Sunday-school Society may well be congratulated upon the gift that they have just received at the hands of a lady who is greatly interested in the welfare of our young people; I refer to Bernard Cottage, a small house at Southend, standing on high ground, as its address—15, Hillcrest-road—fitly implies.

For many years now it has been our custom to send London children into the country for a summer holiday, but we have been obliged to limit the age to thirteen, because it was found that the same methods, &c., were not practicable for elder boys and girls which were well adapted to children.

And yet the young people of our senior classes, and also many of our teachers, need to have a change quite as much as the others, and they have almost as much difficulty in getting proper accommodation on account of their slender purses!

It is to meet this want that Mrs. Bayle-Bernard has so kindly bought the freehold of this little house, and, having furnished it, has passed it over to the London Sunday-school Society; and we feel sure that the best thanks that we can give to her, is to make it as useful as possible.

In order that friends may know something definite about the scheme, let me proceed to state its object and rules as tersely as I can.

Object.—The providing of a seaside home for (a) elder scholars, above thirteen years of age, to be accompanied, if possible, by a teacher; (b) women connected with our Sunday-schools, mothers' meetings, &c.; (c) friends connected with members of our congregations, and others approved by the officers appointed by the London Sunday-school Society Committee.

Mode of Admission.—For the present, application is to be made through the School (C.H.M.) delegate to Miss Toye, general secretary of the C.H.M., 156, Stepney-green, E. The age and sex of applicants, the time and the length of visit desired, to be stated.

Payments.—For Classes A and B, 7s. weekly. For Class C, from 10s. to 15s. weekly, according to circumstances.

It will be seen from the above that the first wish is to give the opportunity for a teacher to accompany his or her class for a short holiday. I say short, for it is rarely possible for our artisan class to get the chance of more than a week.

We regard it, on the whole, as a real advantage that the cottage will only take a few guests at a time; there is room for one teacher and five, or at most six, scholars, so that it makes quite a family party. It is true that just during perhaps three months of the year we could fill a large house, yet, except at that time, it is not very likely that more than a few of our young people can get away. And it is for these emptier months that we suggest using the house for Class C. For when not needed for elder scholars, or mothers, or teachers, it may be a mutual advantage to have the rooms occupied by other friends.

We have been fortunate enough to secure the services of one whom we believe will prove a very able matron. Mrs. Gilbert has long been connected with our London Sunday-schools, and, for the last three years, having removed into the country with her husband, has given most efficient help in housing, and in finding other homes for several of our children sent for their country holiday. Mrs. Gilbert tells me that she has long wished for a post of the kind, and so we feel that there is every reason to hope for excellent results from this appointment.

A few simple rules are hanging up in the rooms; no alcohol is to be taken, no smoking is allowed in the house. Punctuality is requested, and an intimation given that guests are expected to attend the Unitarian service held in the Southend Chapel. But the main emphasis is given to the motto Each for all, which suggests the spirit which we desire to see pervading the whole household; and it was interesting to hear how, from the first moment, this was taken to heart and put into practice.

For you must know that the first party went down on Saturday last. It was very hurried work to get the furnishing done, and Mrs. Bayle-Bernard and Miss Margaret Cooper had been working at high pressure all the week. Mrs. Gilbert being unable to come for a fortnight, Miss Elsie Pritchard kindly undertook the post of hostess to the first batch of guests, and these arrived just at the moment when the two ladies were about to depart. It was a very hot day and there were bags to be carried to the station; "each for all" was the motto; the ladies had worked for the guests, and the guests were ready, at a word, to turn round and carry their bags to the station without waiting for the cup of tea, to which, no doubt, they had been anxiously looking forward after their hot and dusty journey.

And with such a spirit with which they begin their holiday we cannot be surprised to hear that they are having a very happy time. There are some small difficulties of course, as is always the case at the first start of a new venture; the cooking range is not quite obedient to orders as yet, and boiled meat has to be substituted for roast at times; appetites are sharpened by the invigorating air, and bread is apt to run short on a Bank holiday. But who wants to have things go on one dead level; everybody likes a little excitement, and all these small troubles only serve as an excuse for an extra bit of merriment, and everyone is content to take things happily and to get enjoyment out of everything.

We should have liked to have had the Home opened with a small flourish of trumpets! But, alas! we could not get possession in time to furnish before almost all our friends had gone away for their own holidays. Still we are hoping to be able, before the summer has quite given place to autumn, to arrange to have an open day at our Seaside Home, in order that friends may have the opportunity of paying it a visit, and of seeing how pleasant and cosy it is. We are desirous that one of the members of our Southend congregation may eventually take up the office of secretary, as that would be a great advantage all round, but for the present Miss Toye is taking this branch as part of the Country Holiday Movement.

The treasurer of the London Sunday-school Society has already made known his wants in this connection, so I need do no more than refer to them here. One hundred pounds a year will, we think, be sufficient to keep up the Home, in addition to the maintenance fees of the visitors; of this amount—which we are anxious to have provided for the first three years—about £70 has been already promised. Friends, therefore, who would like to help forward this excellent piece of work, are invited to send contributions and promises of support to Mr. Ion Pritchard, hon. treasurer, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

MARIAN PRITCHARD.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Sunday-school Treats.

Successful Sunday-school treats are reported from Culmington, Dover, and Saffron Walden.

Ainsworth.—On Saturday last the teachers and elder scholars, about seventy in number, had a ramble through the Tumbles (or Jumbles). After tea, which was served in a garden at Turton, a visit was paid to the church, and an interesting half hour spent inspecting the fine oak carvings and chained bibles, afterwards to Turton Towers, walking through the grounds by kind permission of the owners, and returning home through Bromley Cross and Bradshaw.

Brighton.—The senior members of the Free Christian Church choir, New-road, had their "outing" to Earl's Court Exhibition on Thursday, 3rd inst. Heartly appreciation was expressed by all to the contributors to the day's pleasure.

Huddersfield.—We are glad to note in the prize list of St. Peter's School, York, that Mr. Stanley A. Mellor, son of the Rev. W. Mellor, who is in the sixth form, and is hoping subsequently to enter Manchester College, has carried off the Archbishop's prize for Classics, the Bishop of Bristol's prize for Divinity, and also prizes for Latin verse, and for English essays. Mr. Mellor is to be congratulated on so brilliant a success.

Kidderminster.—The second annual social gathering and garden fete of the New Meeting congregation was held on Saturday week, in the grounds of Greenhill, kindly lent by Mr. Richard Eve, the proceeds to be applied to the church and new hall funds. The charming grounds and the delightful weather both contributed to a very successful gathering. The opening ceremony was performed by the Mayoress, who was accompanied by the Mayor (Alderman Edward Parry). At the request of the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, the Mayoress declared the fete open, and the thanks of the company were cordially offered by Mr. Richard Eve. The Mayor, in reply, assured them that the Mayoress warmly appreciated their kindness in carrying that resolution. It was now more than forty-four years since the Mayoress and himself became interested in the New Meeting House, and he could assure them that their interest had not weakened with the flight of years. He must congratulate the congregation of the New Meeting House upon the position they held in the town and upon the advantage they enjoyed in having such an able and courteous pastor, who was universally respected not only by the members of his own congregation, but by the members of other communities and by all who took an active part in the affairs of the borough. He was glad to know that their society was so well organised. The Mayoress and himself had taken, for many years, a quiet and special interest in all that related to the congregation and their various organisations, and they congratulated the congregation upon the influence for good which they were exerting upon the town. As Mayor he took an interest in everything which concerned the well-being of the town, and rejoiced in the prosperity of all branches of the Christian Church, even though some of them were not in strict harmony with his own way of thinking. He rejoiced in the prosperity of the Established Church, the Wesleys, the Congregationalists, the Baptists, the Primitive Methodists, and all other sections of the Christian Church, but he most of all rejoiced to see the impression which the New Meeting congregation were making on the town. That congregation had always been distinguished by the prominent part the members took in the social and civic life of the borough and in the advocacy and support of all educational movements, and he was glad to know that the present congregation was well maintaining the traditions of their society. While they rejoiced in the progress of all Christian Churches they rejoiced most of all in the progressive influence of that form of religion at once rational and spiritual which was so ably taught at the New Meeting House. It was delightful to see members of a religious body meeting together in a social manner. They might sit together in the same church for years and yet not become so well acquainted with each other as they could in one afternoon on such an occasion as the present. The day has gone by when it was thought that the Christian Church had nothing to do with the amusements of the people, and they were wise in promoting rational amusements and recreation for the people. With the Mayoress he hoped the social gathering would be very successful, and that the New Meeting would be increasingly prosperous in the future. The programme of amusements was very varied, including a performance by the Artillery Volunteer band, races, grand musical drill and maze, by the children of the New Meeting Band of Hope, concert by the choir and Band of Hope, an art gallery, dancing on the lawn, &c., while a number of stalls, managed by the ladies, contributed to the profit of the occasion.

Liscard.—The new church buildings are now so far completed that the congregation have been able to enter on the use of the school-room, and are holding the Sunday services there instead of in the concert-hall. It is expected that the church itself will be opened for public worship on Saturday, Sept. 30.

London Sunday-school Teachers.—On Bank Holiday, for the seventeenth consecutive time, the London Sunday-school teachers enjoyed the kind hospitality of Miss J. Durning-Smith and Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence at their house and extensive grounds at King's Ride, Ascot. The weather was exactly such as the people desired—neither too hot nor too cool—and from first to last everything passed off most pleasantly. There were swings provided, and, in case of need, a tent, which luckily was not required, had been erected. Led by Mr. Frederick Lawrence, B.A., and Mr. Harold Wade, cricket was thoroughly enjoyed, while lawn tennis claimed the sympathies of others. Rambles through acres of pine woods and undulating heatherland were a great delight. Under the direction of the Rev. John Toye, the brass band from Limehouse admirably performed several concerted selections of music, and his choir sang a couple of part songs. An excellent dinner and tea were provided, and, as always, everything was done to make the whole party thoroughly happy. This year everybody wore a distinguishing piece of ribbon, which seemed to give solidarity to a party large enough to be unique and striking. The conduct of the undertaking was excellently managed by Principal Gordon, M.A., of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester. In thanking the kind hosts for the pleasure they had given to London Sunday-school teachers, he said that he was in that position through the lamented death of their dear friend, the late Rev. Robert Spears, who from the beginning had conducted these parties; but he was sure that nowhere and at no other time would Mr. Spears more like to be remembered by his friends than then and there. Never had he (Mr. Spears) been happier than when, in his kindly and genial way, he had been trying to make others happy. Mr. Gordon was supported by the Rev. Henry Williamson, of Dundee, and Mr. R. Ahmed Moulvi, a barrister and an Indian Mohammedan. In replying, Sir Edward Durning-Lawrence, M.P., with great feeling, spoke of the delight which it gave him and Miss Durning-Smith and Lady Durning-Lawrence to be able to give pleasure to the friends assembled before them. And everybody was specially gratified when Miss J. Durning-Smith herself spoke in a similar strain, and referred to the great loss which they had sustained in the death of Mr. Spears, the actual originator of those Bank Holiday gatherings. The following schools were represented:—Limehouse, Stamford-street, Deptford, George's-row, Highgate, Kentish Town, Bell-street, Mansford-street, Rhyl-street, Stepney, Wood Green, Stoke Newington, Stratford, Wandsworth, and Bermondsey, the party numbering upwards of two hundred. Besides those already mentioned, the following ministers and friends were present: Revs. F. Allen, W. G. Cadman (and Mrs. Cadman), G. Carter, A. J. Marchant (and Mrs. Marchant), F. Summers (and Mrs. Summers), L. Tavener (and Mrs. Tavener), Mrs. Farquharson, Mrs. Toye, Misses Lawrence, the Hon. Miss O'Hagan, Mrs. Harold Wade, Miss Lena Martineau, Miss Violet Preston, the Rev. B. Kerr-Pearse, rector of Ascot, Mr. Clennell, Mr. M. Borakatullah, an Indian Mohammedan, and last, not least, everybody was pleased to see and to hear the Rev. J. Cuckson, of Boston, U.S.A., who is taking his vacation in his native land, and who addressed the party in the course of the afternoon.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The third annual camp has been held at Great Hucklow. About seventy scholars and teachers were in camp for the full week, and many others paid shorter visits. The weather was perfect, and everything was delightful and successful.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MANY friends will be glad to have news of the return of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong from his voyage to Newfoundland and Labrador. Mr. Armstrong greatly enjoyed the voyage, and is much better, but he is not to preach until September, wisely spending the rest of this month in a quiet country retreat. From across the Atlantic Mr. Armstrong sent back the Preface to his little book, "Back to Jesus," which is now passing through the press, and will be published by Mr. Philip Green early in October.

PROFESSOR N. P. GILMAN writes to the Christian Register announcing that after the appearance of the December number of the New World he will be obliged to retire from his position as managing Editor of that valuable Quarterly, as he is to spend a great part of next year in this country and in France. He expresses undiminished confidence in the New World, which is now in its eighth year, and is very anxious that a sufficient endowment fund should be secured for the maintenance of the Review. In no other way, in his opinion, could £12,000 or so be more profitably invested for the furtherance of liberal religious thought. "American Unitarianism cannot afford to bear the reproach of the discontinuance of such a review"; and we may add that should such a calamity be allowed to happen, it would be very keenly felt on this side of the Atlantic also.

THE congregation of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, are preparing to celebrate next year the Bi-centenary of their chapel, and it has been determined that the celebration shall include the following items :—

- (1.) The issue of a history of the chapel, to be prepared by the Rev. J. E. Manning.
- (2.) The re-cutting of the inscription on the tombstone in the yard of the Rev. Timothy Jollie, first minister of the chapel.
- (3.) The placing of a tablet on the left side of the choir stalls, with an inscription referring to the Bi-centenary, followed by a copy of the inscription on Timothy Jollie's tombstone.
- (4.) Certain improvements to the vestry, and possibly to the organ and to Channing Hall.
- (5.) Special meetings in celebration of the Bi-centenary.

For these purposes it is estimated that about £500 will be required, of which about £300 is already promised. It has been decided not to hold a bazaar, and the congregation and others concerned are asked to contribute the remainder of the amount in direct donations.

THE Van Dyck Tercentenary is being celebrated by an exhibition of the pictures of the great Flemish artist at Antwerp, the place of his birth, the exhibition having been opened on Monday by the King of the Belgians. A pupil of Rubens, who was twenty-two years his senior, Van Dyck survived his master only one year, dying in 1641. Rembrandt, who was eight years younger than Van Dyck, and was a native of Leyden, lived until 1669. Van Dyck is perhaps best known in this country by his portraits of the Stuarts and their contemporaries, having resided for some time in England, in the employ both of James I. and Charles I. We are promised that the Winter Exhibition at the Royal Academy will be devoted to his works.

WRITING in the Church Gazette on the Archbishop's decision as to incense and lights, "Peter Abelard" looks upon it as very awkward for the Ritualists and faces the possibility of their consequently bringing Disestablishment about :—

There is no doubt that the Ritualist Party is well organised, has a very considerable following among the upper classes, and can wield no insignificant political power if it is so disposed. Suppose, then, that they elect to go solid for Disestablishment, and throw themselves into the arms of the Liberation Society? The struggle, then, at the next General Election will be between Ritualists and Radicals on the one side, and Protestants and Conservatives on the other. Recollecting the love of the British to have a turn and turn about in its Governments, and the short memory it has for such services as Lord Salisbury has undoubtedly rendered, it is very conceivable that the victory will be on the side of the Radical-Ritualist Party. What would be our condition then?

Of course, a new constitution would be formed, as a new constitution was formed for the disestablished Church of Ireland, and no doubt the episcopate would form the nucleus round which the disestablished Church would group itself. The wisdom of the bishops would probably be sufficient to prevent disruption, and a somewhat wider liberty would be allowed than the Act of Uniformity of 1559 allows to-day. The Ritualists would not get the Six Points made the form of ceremonial worship, but, on the other hand, their chief point of agreement, viz., resistance to the claim of the State to determine doctrine, discipline, and ceremonial, would be removed in a free Church, and they would be absorbed in the main current of life of the disestablished Church.

Broad Churchmen may be reminded that one of the planks in their platform would be at once attained if the Church were disestablished. The laity would at once be invested with the power which at present is in abeyance, and this single fact should alone induce them to watch with careful eye the turn which events may take in the next few months. Of course all that I have said is necessarily of the nature of guesswork, but it is based on some sort of data supplied by the sayings and doings of the last week. Time alone, which holds the keys of the unknown, can tell whether the forecast given above will be justified by events. To me it seems to-day the most likely course to follow, and if things do so turn out, it is not the Broad Churchman who will lose in the long run.

At the annual general meeting of the Central and East of England Society for Woman's Suffrage, held at Westminster Town Hall, Mrs. Perkins Stetson (author of the recently published work "Women and Economics") made an interesting speech. "Woman's Suffrage," she said, "is a sort of vanguard movement, and until women get the Suffrage they cannot get all the other things they want. It is the duty of every human creature to share in the work of the world, and some form of representative government is the best way of carrying this out. For many centuries, government was looked upon as the power of making people do things, so largely was it occupied with punishment. The principle of government now is the service of the people, and, because government means service and helping people to do their duty, women are not filling their place in the world until they fill their place in the government. The spirit we want to feel is, not that of persons who are oppressed, but that of persons determined that they will do their work. One of our troubles is that people who see their plan ahead and understand the relative importance of things, because they cannot make other people see what they see, are tired-out and discouraged. An old Suffragist said to me once: 'I do not see who will take our places when we are gone.' No one will, no one can take their places. This movement progresses along a thousand channels. Everything that brings women together, everything that interests them in the large public good and sets them to work for it, whatever concerns principles and social duty, leads ultimately to Woman's Suffrage. The reason we want the Suffrage is because the exigencies of life have made it the only way of getting things done. In feudal times to follow a noble lord sufficed. But when the fighting days were over, representative government began. When we women enter into that form of life which requires representative government, we shall grow into that government. There is no need for the discouragement so often shown about the Woman Movement, for it is the most phenomenally rapid movement of any in human history. In this one century women have advanced more than in all the centuries before. The most important thing to realise is that government means service, and any one will understand that it is a woman's duty to serve. As the world grows it learns more and more that we can best serve each other through organisation, and that the most effective organisation for public service is the government. Wherever there is a government and there are women, they belong to that government." The chair was taken by Mrs. Sterling, and the other speakers were Mr. Morgan Browne, Miss Emily Davies, Miss Dowson, Mrs. Henry Fawcett, LL.D., and Miss Jenner.

THE PINK PARTY AT GRINDELWALD.

SIR,—I trust many of your readers are now aware of the delightful summer excursions which the officials of the Central Postal Mission Committee have arranged for a number of years to various places in England and on the Continent. Those who have joined one or more of the fortnightly parties know, of course, how delightful they are, and how splendidly they are managed, and those who have never joined one of these parties, or who know nothing about them, should (if necessary) burn the midnight oil in enlightening their ignorance and test their knowledge by the practical experience of a fortnight's holiday, under the able guidance of those in charge. The present party is the middle one in this year's series of fortnightly excursions. When we collected on the Harwich boat—the good ship Cambridge, bound for Antwerp—it was found that we hailed from a variety of places. We came from Birkenhead and Brighton, from Sheffield and Exeter, and there was a good contingent from London fleeing from the intense heat of 90 deg. in the shade. I need not describe the journey; some of those who made it are glad to forget part of it. The sea was not too kind, and people do not like to recall the memory of painful sensations; and the Rev. John Ellis has made any further description unnecessary by the vivid account he gave of the journey of the first party in a previous issue of your paper. We started on Thursday night, Aug. 3, and arrived at Grindelwald on Saturday evening, Aug. 5, and received a very warm welcome from Miss Tagart, Mrs. Rutt, Mr. Shrubsole, and Dr. Herford.

It was cheering to be received by well-known friends after a long and weary journey in unknown lands. But the weariness was all forgotten, when from the verandah of the Alpina we looked out on the snow mountains which seemed so near, and were so far. I cannot describe in words my own sensations when I first saw the Wetterhorn, the Finsteraarhorn, and the Eiger—lofty peaks covered with everlasting snow—towering above me in their majestic beauty. Feelings of awe, wonder, worship, inspiration, gratitude, mingled in my heart, and brought me very close in silent communion to God, the Creator.

Sunday broke over the mountains in golden splendour. A peacefulness stole over the spirit, and the weary ones found rest. During the week various walks and excursions were taken, Mr. W. H. Shrubsole acting as guide, and every one bears testimony that he is an ideal guide. The excursions of the past week were but the preliminaries to the longer walks and harder climbs of the present week, and we are looking forward to the big walk up the Faulhorn, which is to take place on Wednesday, and from which a fine panorama of snow-capped mountains can be seen. I preached on Aug. 6, and the service yesterday was conducted by the Rev. Philemon Moore, and in the evening a Conference on the "Larger Outlook of Unitarianism" was held. The party fully appreciate the thoughtfulness for everybody's comfort and enjoyment shown by our hostesses, Miss Tagart and Mrs. Rutt, and the only regret is that our fortnight is so quickly drawing to its close.

J. E. STRONGE.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL HOLIDAY HOME.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to call attention to the Holiday Home, established by our Manchester District Sunday-school Association? Some two years ago a small seaside home was presented to us by Mr. C. C. Grundy, and this has been maintained since then with great benefit to the little convalescents of our Sunday-school. Now we are proposing to undertake the larger task of organising summer holidays, or at least of making such possible, for the whole body of the teachers and scholars in our schools. The incalculable benefit to our school life of the friendship and confidence which grow out of the close intimacies and shared joys and anxieties of a common life lived together for a whole week appealed to us as Sunday-school workers, while the pity of child life in sad exile in our northern towns touched us all into enthusiasm for a scheme which the experience of the Upper Brook-street and Renshaw-street schools had proved to be eminently practicable. Great Hucklow, a little village in the High Peak of Derbyshire, a place consecrated by centuries of faithful testimony and ministry in our little old chapel, and endowed with the more prosaic advantages of good air and water, a village far, very "far from the madding crowd," was selected for experimental purposes. Here a plot of land has been presented to us by the Rev. L.

Scott, and upon this we may eventually erect permanent buildings; in the meantime we have taken temporary premises, the Old Hall, once the residence of the "Apostle of the Peak," being our headquarters, with the privilege of overflowing into all the cottages of the village and, if necessary, of taking in also all the spare rooms of the adjoining villages of Windmill and Grindlow. The existing accommodation of the Old Hall has been supplemented by the purchase of twenty beds and everything else requisite to the simple comfort and convenience of a party of thirty. The camp, as we like to call it, was inaugurated about the middle of July, and the first party to venture was the Swinton school, of whose doings you have already given a glowing account. Upper Brook-street followed with a veritable army of young and old, doubling the population of the old village and much disturbing its usual calm. Bradford, Manchester, followed with a smaller party of about thirty, and a similar number is now "in camp" from the Stockport school. Next week we are threatened with an invasion from Newchurch, and all the cottages are preparing to house its eighty odd representatives. Finally, our friends at Willert-street, Manchester, are sending a small party of thirty for the week ending Sept. 2. After that we have still two weeks unappropriated. The scheme, unfortunately, was not launched in time to enable many schools to take advantage of it. But with our knowledge of the possibilities of a week at Hucklow it is to us an appalling thought that the Hall should be empty for a couple of weeks. I am, therefore, writing on behalf of our Committee, to call the attention of Sunday-school workers and others to the fact that the two weeks from Sept. 2 to 16 are still open and to invite applications. Perhaps at such short notice it will be impossible for any one school to organise a party large enough to fill the Hall, may I therefore say that I shall be glad to receive applications from small groups, or even individuals for either of the two weeks? Great Hucklow is four miles from Miller's Dale Station, and special fares are granted by the Midland Railway. For adults the inclusive cost of rail, board, and lodging would be about seventeen shillings per week. September is often a beautiful month in the High Peak, and if the nights draw in the inside of the old Hall will be found to be very cosy and warm. Letters should be addressed to me as under.

To watch one's soul all the time, seeking for moral disease, is as bad as to watch one's body all the time, seeking for physical disease. Do not look within to see whether your feelings are right, but look without to see what you are doing for others: what you are saying: what your temper and spirits are to those about you. Look up, also, for higher light and more life.—J. F. Clarke.

Go not forth to call Dame Sorrow
From the dim fields of To-morrow.
Let her roam there all unheeded
She will come when she is needed.
Then, when she comes near your door
She will find God there before.

LITERATURE.

DR. SAMUEL DAVIDSON.*

DURING his long life of ninety-one years Dr. Davidson was the central figure of one great controversy, and subsequently went through significant changes in personal conviction. A native of Ireland, of Scotch descent, he was trained for the Presbyterian ministry, and having subscribed the Westminster Confession "with exceptions," was licensed to preach when he was twenty-seven, and two years later was appointed to a new Professorship of Biblical Criticism in connection with the General Synod of Ulster. Then he married on a professional income of £100, with £60 from students' fees added. He was not, however, happy in the Presbyterian atmosphere, and on the foundation of the Lancashire Independent College, in 1843, he accepted a Professorship and settled in Manchester.

His College duties consisted in teaching Hebrew, and lecturing on Biblical Literature and Ecclesiastical History. Literary and public work filled up his spare time, and he must have been a laborious worker. After the publication of the first volume of his "Introduction to the New Testament" in 1848, the Theological Faculty of the University of Halle made him a Doctor of Theology, and as time went by he became intimately acquainted, either personally or by correspondence, with the leaders in theological scholarship in Germany. When the "Introduction to the New Testament," in three volumes, had been completed, it was followed (1852) by "A Treatise on Biblical Criticism, Exhibiting a Systematic View of that Subject"; and by "The Hebrew Text of the Old Testament, revised from Critical Sources" (1855).

Then came the great conflict of his life. Chapter VI. is headed "The College Crisis," and is from the pen of Mr. J. Allanson Picton, at that time one of Dr. Davidson's students. It was many years later, at his old teacher's request, that Mr. Picton undertook to tell the story. Mr. Picton tries to hold the balance with an even hand, but there is no lack of vigour in his championship of Dr. Davidson, and his arraignment of the College Committee. Certainly, as the story of the period between November, 1856, and June, 1857, goes on, we feel that Davidson was a hardly-used man. Mr. Picton is careful to point out that while on the one hand Dr. Davidson's subsequent opinions advanced rapidly in the direction of rationalism, he was sincerely orthodox in all essential points when the storm broke; and that, on the other hand, we must not allow the present condition of thought on Biblical matters to make us underrate the natural alarm felt forty years since at suggestions of the composite character of the Pentateuch, and the late origin of most of its component parts. The "Crisis" came about in this way: Davidson accepted an invitation from Messrs. Longman to take part in the revision of Horne's "Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures." At first, Vols. 2 and 4, dealing respectively with the Old and New Testaments, had been offered to him; but he preferred to undertake the former only, and at his suggestion Dr. Tregelles was asked to deal with Vol. 4. Davidson stipulated that his own name should appear on the title-page of Vol. 2, and told the publishers that he should probably re-write the whole volume, not retaining any of Mr. Horne's matter, but should "start entirely on new ground—such ground as the subjects have been brought to, not only here, but especially in other countries." He naturally had Germany most in his mind, for there—since the beginning of the century—there had been fearless handling of Biblical questions in the various seats of learning. The first article of the constitution of the Lancashire College declares: "That the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain the only revealed will of God, and are therefore the sole and exclusive authority in the Christian Church"; but Mr. Picton aptly remarks that the acceptance of this article by no means involves an acceptance of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. As Davidson proceeded with his task, proofs were constantly interchanged between Horne, Tregelles and himself, and neither of his colleagues hinted any alarm. Davidson, it may be observed, went by no means so far in various points as the Editors of the "Polychrome Bible" do to-day. The volume was published in October, 1856, "and," says Mr. Picton, "was well received by all English readers who were anxious to bring their Biblical studies into the light of knowledge." But the following month a member of the College Committee, the Rev. D. E. Ford, of Broughton, "informed his colleagues, with much manifestation of emotion, that he had received numerous letters expressing great alarm at the religious opinions set forth by Dr. Davidson." Dr. Tregelles had made it clear that he had not read Davidson's proof-sheets, by writing to the Record to express his sorrow and surprise that Dr. Davidson had used the work "as the occasion for avowing and bringing into notice many sentiments and theories with regard to Scripture which his former works would not have intimated that he held, and his adoption of which was wholly unknown to Mr. Horne and myself." Tregelles and Horne should surely have acknowledged that though they had received the proof-sheets they had not read them, but this was not understood until later, and meanwhile the agitation grew. The College Committee appointed a sub-committee to examine the book and report on it. The report, when presented, took more than two hours to read, but its gist was summed up in a brief printed paragraph, in which it was stated that there were many passages which, taken by themselves, seemed to indicate very unsatisfactory views on some important doctrines of the Gospel: such as on the Trinity, human depravity, the sacrifice of Christ, justification by faith, &c. Mr. Picton well remarks that this "&c." is "noteworthy," if unjudicial, and "opens up a dim perspective of unmentioned heresies." The summary concludes: "Other statements, however, found in different parts of the volume, as well as the explanations given orally by Dr. Davidson, fully satisfy the sub-committee that he holds all these vital truths, and regards Holy Scripture as inspired—an unerring authority in morality and religion, and infallible in every other important matter." For the rest of the story of this controversy we must refer our readers to Mr. Picton's narrative. Further explanations were asked, and in May, 1857, Dr. Davidson published a pamphlet of 124 pages, entitled, "Facts, Statements, and Explanations," justifying with great wealth of learning the positions he had taken up, and at the same time earnestly re-affirming his belief in various Evangelical doctrines. But still the orthodox objectors were not satisfied, and finally he tendered his resignation, and the Lancashire College lost its most distinguished teacher. The great majority of his past and present students testified their regard for him in earnest and touching addresses; a public meeting was held to express sympathy with him; and a sum of £3,000 was promptly raised and presented to him by the many friends who felt how sorely he had been tried, and how faithful he had been to conscience. Mr. Picton's concluding paragraphs may be quoted here:—

But it was not in vain that Dr. Davidson passed through the crisis we have sketched. The inevitable reaction followed. There was hardly an organ of devout learning in Great Britain, Europe, or America which did not lament and condemn the infatuated blindness of the Lancashire College Committee. Dr. Vaughan, who had given his ill-judged and uncalled-for vote against his colleague, soon felt his position intolerable, and resigned his post. The new appointments, made in the interests of a sacred conservatism, did not keep out the rising tide of liberalism. Imperceptibly the teaching of the lecture rooms came into practical accord with the volume which had deprived the college of its greatest scholar and most inspiring tutor. And if Dr. Davidson himself afterwards went much further, that was only because he was before his time.

"Before his time." Yes; because of his singular union of simple devoutness with unreserved freedom of thought. We do not forget that he owed much to German scholars, and that even in Great Britain and America his latest opinions are common ground to liberal theologians. But what differentiated him was the marked survival throughout all his intellectual pilgrimage of meek reverence and simple devotion, such as made the prayers of his old age like those of a worshipping child. Those to whom the universe is a temple, or rather the Living God Himself, find no paradox in such a combination. But paradox or not, it points the way to the religion of the coming age.

Samuel Davidson lived for forty-one years after his retirement from the Lancashire College, and the "Autobiography" contains much of interest about his subsequent literary work, issued under conditions of greater freedom, his intercourse with scholars at home and abroad, and his political opinions; he was a vigorous Radical and Home Ruler, and a great lover of peace and righteousness among the nations, being little disposed to spare either Liberal or Conservative Governments if they offended his sense of right. We learn, too, of the development of his thought on matters ecclesiastical, theological and religious. Some of his later writings naturally deepened the feeling against him in orthodox Nonconformity; and, from about 1870 onwards, he says, "I worshipped no more among orthodox Dissenters, but repaired quietly to the Unitarians, and sometimes to the Church of England, taking my place among the unnoticed there, enjoying many of the prayers and the devotional part of the services without attaching importance to the sermons." Having begun as a Presbyterian, and abode for a time in the Congregationalism which had cast him out, he became a firm believer in the desirability of an Established Church. "I think," he says, "that it is best, considering the present state of education in Great Britain, to have a national Church as comprehensive as possible, with a very short creed. The clergy belonging to it should be supported by the Government, as instructors in the principles of righteousness, morality, and virtue. They should be regarded as the religious educators of the people. The evils inherent in the voluntary system are greater than those connected with an Established Church." Of course, all readers of the "Autobiography" will not agree with this. But the mature and re-affirmed judgment of such a man as Davidson is worthy of respectful consideration. Theologically, during all his later life, he was a Unitarian, with a profound reverence for Jesus Christ, and a full appreciation of the spiritual revelation which came through him.

There is only passing reference in the volume to some names held in high honour among us, but there is a fuller and very beautiful tribute to the late Dr. Sadler, of Hampstead, of whose ministry and of personal intercourse with him Davidson speaks in the warmest and most affectionate terms.

It hardly falls within the scope of this notice to touch on the many questions of criticism raised in the volume, or to estimate the permanent value of Davidson's work. Readers of THE INQUIRER will remember the contributions from his pen which sometimes enriched these pages and those of the Theological Review. And the book before us, the last he ever wrote, is full not only of interest but of suggestiveness; and it is brightened here and there by a delightful story or a gleam of humour.

The "Reminiscences by Friends," with which the volume ends, bear testimony to the affectionate regard in which Davidson was held by those who knew him; and we close the book with the consciousness of having traced the long earthly pilgrimage of a devoted soul, ever loyal to truth, and waiting in calm faith for the fuller revelations of the eternal world.

SOCIAL REFORM.*

"HIGHER Life for Working People" is an earnest attempt to solve some of those social problems that worry us all at times. The author scouts Socialism as impracticable, revolutionary, and inimical to freedom. He believes it to be possible to remedy present social evils without injustice either to the rich or the poor. With perfect confidence in his own proposals, he is rather inclined to pour scorn on those who see objections to them. Yet, on the whole, he writes in the style of a fair-minded, moderate man who is sincerely anxious to find the line of least resistance for social reform. To students of modern social problems there is little that is new, much that will commend itself to them.

* "Higher Life for Working People: an Attempt to solve some Pressing Social Problems, without Injustice to Capital or Labour." By W. Walter Stephens. (Longmans. 3s. 6d.)

Those who lack time or inclination for minute study will find in the book a clear, moderate, and practical exposition of a great question. Most readers, probably, will feel that the main fault of the writer is that he is apt to under-estimate the difficulties in the way of carrying out his proposals.

The first chapter deals with the "Submerged Tenth." These the author divides into three classes: (1) The aged and the incapable (mentally or physically); (2) The unemployed, but willing to work; (3) Able to work, but not willing.

For the aged and incapable the present Poor Law system, or some modification of it, would have to be retained. When people cannot, by reason of age or infirmity, do any work, they must be provided for without asking them for any return. Mr. Walker would not touch the Poor Law system except to amend it. The second chapter is a plea for more rational and humane treatment of paupers. We are told that we ought to discard "all the evils" connected with Poor Law administration. We agree. The trouble begins when we seek to define the evils. There are things needing reform that would create no difficulty—the useless cruelty of separating old folks who have spent their lives together, for example—but beyond such glaring cases there is room for wide difference of opinion.

To provide for the unemployed who are willing to work, Mr. Walker advocates the establishment of Home Colonies which must be self-supporting and must not intrude upon the ground "at present occupied by industrial forces." The details of the scheme are carefully thought out and worthy of attentive consideration. But we must be content with the quotation of one paragraph:—

Let it be understood that there is no suggestion here of forming any self-sufficient community of the "Harmony Hall" or "Brook Farm" order, which would be destined to failure by the very fact of its isolation from the social world. The suggestion is simply to add here and there over the country, and in most cases near to the localities where a congested population exists, a new village, which, although assisted at first, would, in the course of time repay the advances made to it, and would then become in every respect similar to the other villages of the kingdom. It would be founded in the country by the labour-organising boards representing the ratepayers of the area, and would provide employment for the unemployed and the casually employed, at present a burden on the ratepayers. The rates, instead of being applied, as at present to some extent, in supporting people in idleness, would be wholly applied in setting them to work and in enabling them in time to gain by their work their own support.

The important point in this scheme is that the workers would produce for their own consumption only. There would be no competition with ordinary markets. They would merely take upon their own shoulders a burden which is now borne by other people.

The third-class, the idle, who have no ambition to work, would be sent to labour colonies in which a little wholesome discipline would make workers of them for a time, willing or unwilling. In order to ensure uniformity of method in administration the country would be divided into districts or provinces, each province to contain a population of two to two and a-half millions. The local authorities in these areas would be subject to the control of a "Central Board, either of a 'Committee of the Privy Council,' or a body of 'Commissioners for the Employment of the Poor,' presided over by a responsible Minister of State." It is a good scheme, and with the experience of the Education Department to guide us, there should be little difficulty in organising it.

Mr. Walker tackles the Old Age Pension question in the happy confidence that his scheme is free from objections that the Select Committee on Old Age Pensions took to the schemes laid before them. He insists that any scheme to be successful must supplement, not supersede, any other benefit scheme with which the contributor may be connected. It must not commit Parliament to obligations for the future of which a definite estimate cannot be made, and it must be simple and economical. How does Mr. Walker propose to fulfil these conditions? For details we must again refer our readers to the book itself. But, broadly put, his scheme is this: "Wage-earners of all classes under the age of eighteen to contribute sixpence per month, between eighteen and twenty-one ninepence; above twenty-one one shilling per month. The payments to be made by means of special stamps for the amount, procured from any post-office, and affixed to cards prepared for the purpose." The amount thus paid is to be doubled by the employer and the Government conjointly. A man paying one shilling per month would receive sixpence from his employer and sixpence from the State. Beyond this he would receive no gift or benefit, but he might add to his own contribution, and so increase the value of his annuity by his own savings. Now comes a great feature of the scheme. No one can benefit by it until twenty years' contributions have been paid. There would then be no need for a large Treasury grant. For twenty years the contributions would be accumulating before the first annuity was claimed, and the State contribution would be "merely a book entry." Assuming that three million workers joined the scheme, there would be, at the end of twenty years, a fund of forty-five millions in hand to begin with. That strikes us as a practical and sensible plan, and will be disappointing only to those who want everything done in a hurry.

We have dealt with those topics which have a wide public interest. The rest of the book is occupied with the discussion of questions that affect mainly the higher class of workmen—prevention of strikes, profit-sharing, the eight-hours day, and so on. These are questions that will gradually be settled by the intelligence of those most concerned. The better-class worker is keenly alive to his own interest, and likes to work out his salvation in his own way. The problem of how to help the very poor should have the careful thought of every humane person, and we commend Mr. Walker's book to the attention of those who love their fellow-men.

IN A GARDEN.

I THINK we never realise how spiritually dull and God-forsaken we gradually tend to become by living in modern towns (where people find it so difficult to believe in God—sincerely) until we have had a short spell of holiday in the country, especially in meadow land or real garden. That frequent charge brought against ministers of being dull, we begin to suspect and admit to be true—dull, at any rate, for three parts of the year. And if it were all our own fault, there would be good ground to reform church-going altogether. A good, famous minister, somewhat of a farmer and a gardener too, I imagine, once put in a defence for all the dull race of us. "In the churches, they talk about ministers being dull," he said. "One half the time it is bad ventilation. We are not half as dull as the people think we are." That seems to me a very notable defence, and two-edged. Now, for one month in the year at any rate, pondering matters over in a garden (a real garden), no minister would permit even his worst enemy to charge him with being dull; for the ventilation under the blue dome of heaven, with its fleecy curtains, in a garden is perfect. No one ever caught cold going into a house, or a church or a theatre, but by coming out of these places with their ill ventilation. The North American Indian lives and sleeps under the blue sky, all weathers, and is not known to catch cold at all. But pure ventilation is not the only dispeller of dullness. Our able defender also said, "Congregations would be advantaged by it, if for a few weeks of every year they would allow their pastors a little farm-life. Three weeks at a fashionable watering-place will not do the work. There is not enough salts and sulphur in all the springs to overcome the tight shoes and the uncomfortable gloves, and the late hours, and the high living, and the dresses economical at the neck. Rather turn us out to physical work." This defender lived, I surmise, most of his time on his farm—like the Irish ministers on the glebes attached to their Manse, and no one, I suppose, ever met a dull Irish minister—and so he was able to say, "There is something in this country air to put one in blindest mood. Yesterday we allowed a snake to cross our path without any disposition on our part to kill it. We are at peace with all the world. We would not hurt a spider. We could take our bitterest foe and give him a camp-stool on the piazza. We would not blame him for not liking us if he liked our strawberries. We would walk arm-in-arm through water-melon patch and peach orchard. He should be persuaded that if we could not write good sermons and vivacious lectures we can nevertheless raise great pumpkins, and long orange-carrots, and Drumhead cabbage. We would take him in our carriage, going at a consistent ministerial gait—never racing with anyone if there were danger of our being beaten. We hereby proclaim peace for ever with any man who likes our hens. We fear we would have been tempted to do many doubtful things even if he had praised our early scarlet radishes." "It is never real morning," he says, "except in the country." "Morning!" he exclaims, "I wish I had a rousing bell to wake the whole world up to see it. Every leaf a psalm. Every flower a censer. Every bird a chorister. Every sight beauty. Every sound music. Trees transfigured. The skies in conflagration. The air as if sweeping down from hanging-gardens of Heaven." Well, I for one am thankful that one or two of our fraternity have farms, gardens and carriages, and the courage to say these things. We look up to them as the submerged majority look up to the elect in Heaven from another place. We begin to suspect we have read the opening chapters of Genesis without ever clearly realising what they meant. But Sir Francis Bacon—always so much better when writing his own works than anyone else's—in his charming essay on Gardens, at the outset, implies that all deviation from God-implanted instincts is also a deviation from God himself. God meant us to live in gardens. "God Almighty," he says, in his lofty opening sentences, "first planted a garden; and, indeed, it is the purest of human pleasures; it is the greatest refreshment to the spirits of man; without which building and palaces are but gross handy-works: and a man shall ever see, that, when ages grow to civility and elegancy, men come to build stately, sooner than to garden finely; as if gardening were the greater perfection."

The writer of Genesis implies that so long as man was in this Garden of the Lord, occupied in dressing it and keeping it, not only was God known to him, but was very close to him, walking beside him in the garden, and in that close and divine companionship we have not the slightest indication that work, that labour seemed irksome or painful to him. And one must needs reflect, and we should, if we were in the company of a gardener long, that dressing and keeping a garden of the kind implied in Eden involved a great deal of labour. From four o'clock in the morning (at least in summer) till nine or ten at night, so at least a very intelligent gardener told me lately, there was occasion for constant and most varied occupation, thought, skill, and labour in dressing and keeping even an ordinary market garden. I was given to understand that the sense of irksomeness and toil was considerably eased both by a natural pleasure that intelligent gardening begets in men, and, of course, also by prospect of gain. The element of gain, of course, did not enter into the matter in the case of Adam, and it is all the more suggestive, that so long as God was in the garden with him, in close and divine communion with him, the sense of irksomeness and fatigue does not seem to have made itself prominent, being absorbed apparently in something that cancelled its natural painfulness. At any rate it is not till innocent, whole-hearted occupation amidst delightful things, and close Divine communion ceased that things began to change. When God became only a distant voice, with a certain awfulness about it, and then a very far off voice indeed, with anger and a curse in its tones, then man began to discover that labour which, before, in God's presence and company was sweet, was now bitter and painful; and not till Mammon offered himself as an object of worship, and offered gain as his reward, did a little delusive kind of ease begin to enter into labour. And then Mammon suggested a few other things which have brought us to our present state of happy civilisation.

In a garden—and I may say in passing, that recently I have been in a great variety of gardens, in a fine old English garden attached to a parsonage, in cottage gardens, in market gardens, in a stately manor house garden, in some public gardens, and in God's Acre—in a garden, such an one at any rate as Sir Francis Bacon was thinking of when he said, "I do hold it in the royal ordering of gardens, there ought to be gardens for all the months in the year, in which, severally, things of beauty may be then in season . . . that you may have 'ver perpetuum,'" in such a garden "where everlasting spring abides and never withering flowers," it would scarcely be possible not to believe in God, and it would be so easy, as I confess I find it to be, to believe in an invisible world filled with very real beings, God's ministers to do his pleasure—whether we call them angels or not is immaterial—beings apparently delighting to co-operate with us on this side of the strange veil that divides the miraculous doings of the Invisible world from the marvellous effects in the Visible world. I have been recently in one or two gardens that would fairly have satisfied Sir Francis Bacon, and have felt with increasing conviction that the realities behind the wonderful daily and hourly transformation scenes of a garden are not blind cosmic forces, but all-seeing intelligences. Cardinal Newman frankly confessed that behind every plant passing so rapidly, so marvellously into flower, he perceived, as the only valid explanation, an intelligent agent which he called an angel. When we see beautifully worked flowers in a piece of embroidery, we know there has been needle and silk as means to an end, and we infer an agent, and we sometimes, indeed, see the agent at work. But the fairest work ever done by human hand in this kind bears no comparison with any, even the commonest "lilies of the field." One day as I sat in a garden, being impressed with the rapid changes in the look of a garden from one day to another, especially after a shower of rain, I was struck with the marvellous resemblance in the operation to a scene in a famous factory in Paris. The Gobelins tapestry, I suppose, is the thing most nearly perfect done by human hand; flowers and trees, and scenes of all kinds grow slowly into visible existence by a process of hand-weaving of a marvellously patient and skilful kind. Pieces of Gobelins tapestry are priceless things, reserved as gifts to Kings, and Princes, and States. When you are ushered into the room where a piece of tapestry is in making, you see nothing but the great frame-work of fine threads on which the coming scenes are going to be inwoven; you see a small portion of the design very dimly outlined; you see a very small portion of the work finished, and a little more in actual operation. You scarcely see any progress from moment to moment, any more than when you watch a bud becoming a flower, although you shortly learn how swift the movements really are; you see no workers: all is invisible. In a few years a piece of tapestry will be completed that will hold countless spectators enraptured, as at the Great Paris Exhibition of 1889. After being allowed to stay some time on the visible side of things, you are permitted to pass round and behind to the lately invisible agents. These are no grimy, sordid-locking workmen, sweated down to starvation wages, nor blind cosmic forces, but men with features and looks of highest intelligence and culture, men who would seem quite as well in place in a Cabinet of Ministers of State, and whom, no doubt, the French Government pay highly for their high services in such production.

As I thought of that visit to the Gobelins Factory, the garden in which I sat, seemed to reveal all of a sudden behind a thin veil of threads a multitude of the heavenly host, patiently, skilfully, swiftly weaving that infinitely more marvellous tapestry of trees and plants and flowers, which we call Nature, and choice bits of which are seen to perfection in a beloved and well-tended garden. I wondered whether, when we are permitted to go behind the scenes, we shall ever be deemed worthy also to join that heavenly host, and take part in such embroidery, in such tapestry, and enter into the joy of the Lord of the Design, through being amongst the actual agents in the creation of the finished piece of work. Perhaps there may be degrees of exaltation, and a need to begin at the roots, a need to descend into Hades. The whole force of the reason, as well as the inner intimations of the Spirit put us on the side of the Angels, and not on the side of the Blind Cosmic Forces. Though even so, we would cast our tribute into the out-stretched hand of each blind Bartimeus and join our prayer with his, "Lord that he receive his sight!" At any rate, as saith an ancient sundial, Nos et meditemur in horto.

OXFORD NOTES.

THE spring-summer term, with its work, its anxieties, its examinations, and its distractions, has become a matter of history—an uneventful one for the most part, so far as Manchester College is concerned. The temporary breakdown of several students—was this in deprecatory anticipation of Mr. Carpenter's tender notice of "a slight decline in the appetite for lectures consequent on the relaxing air of Oxford"?—was regrettable; but nothing became the term better than its closing days, when friends and students, old and young, from far and near, joined in the warm tribute to the parting Vice-Principal; and this is not to be taken in derogation of the College programme, which included the conclusion of the valuable courses of lectures open to the public, by the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed on "Sociology (the Laws of Distribution)" and the Rev. J. E. Carpenter on "Comparative Religion (Ideas of Revelation)," but rather as showing how the affectionate and emotional side of life will break through and survive all attacks made on it by stern academic necessities. Here were wit and memory called in aid of some of the best touches of human nature, with gratification to all.

A somewhat new order of things is looked forward to for the beginning of the October term, when Professor Addis not only takes the chair of Old Testament theology vacated by Mr. Carpenter, but is to preside over the houses of residence where hereafter Manchester College students will take up their abode. May the classic street of Holywell, with its ancient houses, feel its dignity enhanced thereby!

Though the technical term be over, much important University work overflows into July, which is also the month for many "gaudys." Gaudy is an Oxford word, the origin of which does not yet seem to be settled among the learned, applied to that ancient and familiar institution, a college dinner. One does not connect University life with dinners, except in term time, forgetting that each college is a society per se; at its annual dinner each college delights to gather its dons together and to honour its distinguished members from far and near, "my college gaudy" attracting many a man from the busy world to meet old comrades at, may-be, Balliol, Magdalen, Queen's, or Oriel.

Among the rush of business and gaiety that, as usual, marked the summer term, two or three noticeable incidents stand out. The fine statue of Charles Darwin, by Mr. Hope-Pinker (the sculptor of Jowett and Dr. Martineau), which has been presented to the University Museum by Professor Poulton, was at the unveiling accompanied by an address from the venerable Sir Joseph Hooker, who gave interesting reminiscences of his life-long friend and brother in science. Thirty years ago, who would have dreamed of seeing Charles Darwin honoured in Oxford, still less of the homage now paid him, not only by the representatives of science here, but, as the Vice-Chancellor said, by "every teacher and every student in the University who is inspired by a real love of knowledge, and animated by a steadfast faith in its capacity for definite advancement." It is a worthy tribute paid to a great man and to great principles. The new library, given to the Parks Museum by the generosity of a London company, is fast rearing its walls; and this brings to mind another handsome but anonymous gift recently made for the benefit of the Medical School in Oxford—namely, £5,000 towards a laboratory for the study of pathology, to which the Congregation voted a like sum, besides £250 annually for equipment and maintenance for five years. Under such men as the Regius Professor Sir J. Burdon Sanderson, and Professor Odling, the study of medicine, somewhat novel here, is thus making progress. The retirement of Sir John Stainer (formerly organist of St. Paul's) from the Chair of Music is a great loss to those who enjoyed the treat provided by the genial professor in his public lectures, with his hits against sham sentiment and his feeling for true English melody. But his hearers may rejoice that to such hands is committed the wide influence for good involved in the Inspectorship of Musical Education under the Government Department.

The season for conferences and great gatherings is hot upon us. The successful and delightful meeting of Sunday-school teachers at Manchester College a month ago will not soon be forgotten. Of still wider interests and attractions is the Summer School of the University Extension students, splendidly organised, and attended by an unusually large number, including a considerable foreign contingent. The presence of some distinguished lecturers, such as Sir Alfred Lyall, Sir Joshua Fitch, Mr. M. E. Sadler, and Professor Sanday, to name but a few, is, of course, accounted a privilege by their hearers; it must be gratifying to the promoters to find how many "extensionists" really mean work, and take a lively interest in the courses provided. Among these studies none are more noteworthy than the course by Dr. Henry Sweet, on "The English Language and Phonetics," treated in the practical scientific manner which has made his name so well known on the Continent; and last, but not least, the three lectures by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, on "The Progress of Biblical Criticism, from 1837 to 1871," which were so keenly appreciated that a fourth lecture was requested. This, carrying on the story somewhat later, was gladly given by the lecturer the following day to a good audience. Manchester College had also previously contributed lectures on "The Philosophy of Religion," by Dr. Dawes Hicks.

OBITUARY.

MR. J. H. ROWLAND.

THE death of Mr. John Henry Rowland, of Neath, at his residence Ffrwd Vale, removes another veteran from our ranks. Born Dec. 2, 1819, at Neath, Mr. Rowland passed away after a long illness on Aug. 8, and was therefore in his eightieth year. A son of Mr. John Rowland, of Glyn Clydach, one of the promoters of the Glamorganshire Bank, he received a liberal education, and practised for some years as a solicitor in London. On the retirement of his father from the management of the bank at Neath, Mr. J. H. Rowland returned to his native country, to devote himself to local and commercial affairs. He was five times Mayor of Neath, and for many years was Chairman of the Board of Guardians. He was also Chairman of the Neath Water Company and of the Harbour Commissioners. He served in 1889-90 as High Sheriff of his county, when the first election of the Glamorgan County Council took place. Subsequently Mr. Rowland became an active member of the Council and an Alderman. He was a Justice of the Peace, a Liberal Unionist in politics, and a friend of education. By religious conviction a Unitarian and a staunch supporter of the Unitarian Church at Swansea, he was also a close friend of the vicar of Neath, and frequently attended the parish church.

The funeral took place at Cadoxton Churchyard on Friday week, and was of a public character, the service being conducted by the vicar of Cadoxton. Mr. Moy Evans and Mr. C. H. Perkins represented the Swansea congregation.

At the Swansea Unitarian Church on Sunday the Rev. W. J. Davies, of Belfast, who is officiating in the absence of the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, alluded to the wide feeling of sorrow that the death of Mr. Rowland had occasioned. He spoke of the genial temperament, the devotion to duty and philanthropic disposition with which Mr. Rowland had been animated, and how wide had been his sympathies which were in no way limited by religious or political opinion. He had occupied many positions, such as Magistrate, Mayor, High Sheriff, Guardian, Educationalist, and in all had earned universal attachment and respect. In him the Swansea Unitarian congregation had lost a great supporter and a consistent follower of the principles it is their aim to maintain and advance. The hearts of all would be with Miss Rowland and the various members of their departed friend's family in their sorrow.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Psalms of the West."

How beautiful is the morning, all bright in its tranquillity! Clear blue is the depth of the heavens, and the earth is silent and calm;

The bloom is purple upon the mountains, the waters are transparent in the valley;

The light leaves tremble above the mosses, and the white stems are mottled with moving shadows;

Silver threads of falling water make music from the corries of the caverned hills, and the scent of the ferns is borne on the dew that ascendeth unseen;

Wild roses trace out the buttresses of the rocks and trail on the banks of the torrent:

They climb around the chambers of the boulders, they make the recesses of the crags a marvel of beauty and joy;

The sweet grass is an emerald floor, and the grey stone is coated with wondrous adornment;

The vesture of earth is aglow with rejoicing life, the very clods have covered themselves with colour and broidery;

The dark pines stand solemn amid the shining oaks, the flowers bloom fair in the great untended garden;

By the swift stream under the woods the beech tree stretcheth her branches, and the melody of singing birds is pleasant among the hawthorns.

An air of the south is freighted with delight, the gathered fragrance of bloom and leafage;

The freshness of the sea hath visited the tree-tops, the essence of ocean spray hath distilled the strength of the forest.

In the alchemy of light the branches are decked with greenery, and every leaf is a sweet influence to the broad wind;

The stream of the air is restored without ceasing; it is a full draught of life to breathe, a reaction for the soul's delight.

In the splendour of the arch of heaven the mind hath a vision of rapture, and resteth on the ethereal deep.

There is gentle enchantment from shining wings; sunshine and shadow weave their woof through the flowery carpet.

A dream of nature alighteth upon me, I am conscious of awful things:

I am entranced in a far-off unity, I am at one with all creation;

I am lost in past and future, I am alone with the years of endlessness;

I am helpless and immersed in power, I am nothingness awaking to universe;

Immensity hath steeped me in her forgetfulness, everlasting changefulness hath poured upon me her mystery;

I am partaker of unspeakable joy, the world of sensation is no longer oppressing me; the soul of the world-soul is the brightness of day untouched and unvanquished for ever.

He that hath seen, he that hath gazed, he that hath loved, and kindled with the living truth, shall return to the earth with power;

And the true shall be to him the image of the perfect soul, and outward vanities shall not hide from him the revelation of silence, the remembrance of divine unfolding.

EVERY duty we omit obscures some truth we should have known.—John Ruskin.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Now, "Touring Club," what is our programme for to-day? Shall we go mountaineering and attack "Ill' Bell," and its 2,600 feet or so of altitude, or shall we hie away to Windermere, and row in our club boat over its beautiful waters, or shall we go for a "ramble scramble?" What is a "ramble scramble?" some of you ask. Well, it is just about the same as a "scramble ramble." Now, do you understand?

Now "Eager Eyes," and "Curly Locks," and "Willing Feet," and all the rest of you, hurry, bustle, skip, for in half an hour we must start. What fun it all is, this delightful getting ready, donning our oldest clothes, stamping into our strongest boots, and picking out trusty and tried walking sticks. Then our girls are cutting away at sandwiches and big hunks of bread and cheese, and there are incessant calls for brown paper and string, and altogether our hive is in a perfect "buzz." Some run in and out keeping an anxious eye on the weather, and one boy thinks of asking the opinion of a passing farmer, but, after the manner of boys, gets his sister to ask for him. Another drop of happiness is in our cup, for the farmer, after alarming them somewhat by a guarded and uncertain commencement, finally sums up by predicting a fine day.

Punctually to time we start and stream down the lanes, as happy and gay as mortals can be. Little hands pluck great bunches of wildflowers, for even now in August our hedgerows and banksides have many floral treasures. An enterprising boy gives a "whoop" of discovery, for he has hit on a number of wild raspberries, and they and many another patch of raspberry canes yield heavy toll to sharp eyes and nimble fingers. A few strawberries are left, but a few only, but just look what quantities of nuts there are on the hazel bushes. They are not ready to gather yet, but they will be in another month or so, and certainly there will be an unusually large crop. I wonder if you would like to come up again, and have a good day's nutting and blackberrying?

I see you are admiring that beautiful young horse in the field. I call him "The Friendly Horse," for he is so sociable and fond of company. You will notice that our lane runs round three sides of his field, and he will follow us from beginning to end, and there we must leave him to munch the tender long grass we give him on parting.

Hurrah! here is our old friend of last year, the "beck," as clear and shining and winsome as ever.

He is so covered with twinkles and dimples, that we have not the heart to frown and ask him how it was he got in such a temper one day last November, and knocked our great strong stone bridge down, and drowned poor sheep, and carried away trees, and hedges, and walls.

What a narrow ricketty bridge we have to cross here! "Jolly" the boys call it, but some of the girls—only "some," please remember—cross it rather timidly. One important member of the party—a certain white dog to wit—disdains the bridge, and bravely swims the stream. This is another great day for Master Jack, and I fancy he realises it, for he is grave and dignified now and again, till his surroundings are too much for him, and he races and frolics, and forgets that he is a "grown-up dog," and will soon be three years of age!

We are clear now of all roads and tracks, and are making our way up the valley as best we can—now on grass, now tramping through the bracken, now skipping the little streams that run down the steep hill sides. Occasionally we have a wet boggy patch to cross, and some of us "pop in," rather deeper than we expected, but that is part of the fun of a "ramble scramble."

What a glorious view we are getting, particularly to the north-west, where we have four ranges of hills, the last and highest being the "Red Screes," and just at the base of "Red Screes," though quite invisible to us, is the summit of Kirkstone Pass.

Passing through a gate (and not forgetting to shut it properly) we reach the edge of another "beck." This is quite a tiny one, perhaps not much over a mile long, for it rises where you can see that great blue gash in yon mountain, and running a few yards past where we now are, takes a daring and tremendous leap into a deep, dark ravine. Every few yards it has a little silver cascade, and then there is generally a little pool—only if you stay in Lake-land you must call it "a dub" instead of a pool. And nearly every "dub" has its occupier in the shape of a nice plump lively trout. Yes, you may roll up your sleeves and try to catch them, but, as we say in Westmorland, "they'll bide some catching," and so you will find out, unless you know the knack of it. In any case, no good fisherman would demean himself by catching trout that way.

I think I can guess what your thoughts are. Let me see. First, it is very warm walking, and you are thirsty, and the water does look so cool and refreshing that a drink occurs to all.

Secondly, now that our thirst is quenched, we have time to think that we are hungry also, and that this is a capital place for lunch.

Thirdly, I will venture to guess that lunch over, you will like to rest here a few minutes and dabble about in the water, and sit on the big sun-warmed stones and—oh, please don't look so cross, Mr. Editor, at the length of this "column"—and we will finish our "ramble scramble" (or "scramble ramble") next week.

DIVINE IMMANENCE.

In this glorious summer, while it has been natural and delightful to be constantly in the open air, and as far as possible in the open country, our thoughts have turned to the deeper meaning of all the beauty of the world, which in such manifold abundance encompasses us on every side. We have learnt from the teaching of science that there is in Nature a marvellous unity, and that all the blending ever-active forces of the universe are but varied expressions of one persistent Power. And that One we, who know the meaning of personal and spiritual power, are compelled to think of not as unintelligent impersonal Force, still less as Matter, whatever that may be, but as the one eternal and infinite Spirit, of whose will and steadfast purpose the whole creation bears witness, in whom we live and move and have our being. It is God's world in which we live, and it becomes to us the temple of His praise. For amid the mystery of His eternal Being, while His word comes to us in every law of Nature, there is this further utterance of Beauty. We have received the call to life, serious and strenuous, in the great field of the world, and in all material things have learnt to recognise the Divine Presence, the power and wisdom of the Eternal, a spiritual purpose awakening in us, even in the very humblest place, kindred purposes of spiritual life. And mingling with this appeal is the great word of Joy. The light of beauty is in the heavens and the earth, and shines straight into human hearts. What can we say of it, but that it is poured out of the heart of that eternal Power, of whom, through whom all things are. It was the faith of WORDSWORTH that every flower enjoys the air it breathes, and whether we share or not that faith of the poet's dream, to spiritual insight it is impossible to doubt that joy is there. What comes to us as a gift has its source in God. Not a flower that blooms, opening its delicate petals in the strength of the Eternal, in fulfilment of His purpose, but bears witness to the Creator's joy in all beautiful things, and, must we not also say, to His love of them?

Thus we are led in the midst of this beautiful world to deeper thoughts of God. He is ever-present, the Eternal Spirit, and as we come to share in the joy which so finds its utterance in the heavens and the earth, we are drawn into communion with Him, as Giver of these spiritual gifts, whom therein we recognise not as Power alone, but as Love.

This constant presence of God in the world, the Eternal in whom the whole universe has its being, the constant Quickener of all life, the Light of all our seeing, is spoken of as the Divine Immanence; and this is the title and the subject of a remarkable essay published last year by the Rev. J. R. ILLINGWORTH, to which we have long desired to call the attention of our readers.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH's Essay,* which may be taken as a sequel to his Bampton Lectures of 1894 on "Personality, Human and Divine," and as following out the thought of his essay of 1890 in Lux Mundi on the Incarnation, is a profoundly interesting and attractive study of the relations of matter and spirit, and so of the relation of Nature (including human nature) to religion. The earlier chapters, after the first on Matter and Spirit, treat of the religious influence of the material world and the Divine Immanence in Nature and in Man; the concluding chapters are on the Incarnation in relation to Miracles, to Sacraments, and to the Trinity. A valuable Appendix is added on Personal Identity and Freewill.

In lucid exposition of his subject Mr. ILLINGWORTH shows how in our experience of life we find that material things are made subservient to spiritual purposes, so that matter becomes the medium of expression for spirit; and then in a delightful chapter he gathers up testimony from many generations, from Egyptian hymns, the Vedas, the Zend-Avesta, the Hebrew Psalms, from classical and early Christian literature, from later theologians, and such poets as SHELLEY and WORDSWORTH, to show how constant has been the religious influence of Nature upon man. Many different interpretations have, of course, been given of that influence. "Still," says Mr. ILLINGWORTH, "beneath them all that experience remains—a sense, in the presence of Nature, of contact with something spiritual; a sense of affinity or kinship, as the Neo-platonists described it, with the material world, implying spirituality within or behind it." And if it be asked, "What is the relation of the material universe to that Spirit of which it so persistently seems to speak?" the answer is that neither Polytheism nor Dualism can any longer satisfy, and God is found as the one Eternal Spirit immanent in the world. Yet not merely immanent in the sense of Pantheism.

Spirit which is merely immanent in matter, without also transcending it, cannot be spirit at all; it is only another aspect of matter, having neither self-identity nor freedom. Pantheism is thus really indistinguishable from materialism; it is merely materialism grown sentimental, but no more tenable for its change of name.

Thus God is acknowledged to be immanent in the world, an abiding Presence, the Giver of all life, and yet transcending it, as in Himself more than all the universe, in His own eternal spiritual life. But if in the material world God is immanent, even more is this the case in man, to whom through conscience and other channels of inspiration the Divine Presence is made manifest.

So far we have found ourselves in complete accord with Mr. ILLINGWORTH's exposition, but at this point we come upon further developments of the thought of the Divine Immanence, which do not in the least appeal to us or win our assent. The divergence we have now to note is expressed in the following passage:—

Thus the interior beauty of holiness comes by degrees to be a visible thing; and through His action upon our spirit, God is made manifest in our flesh. While in proportion as we are able to recognise this progressive manifestation of God in matter, we are prepared to find it culminate in His actual Incarnation, the climax of His immanence in the world.

This, we confess, appears to us by no means a natural sequence, or what we should expect as the culmination of spiritual development in the religious life of the world; it affects us rather as the introduction of a foreign and confusing element of thought. The growing light of Divine truth has revealed to us Nature instinct with the Divine Presence, and the human spirit awakened to a sense of the Eternal, conscious of Divine affinities, knowing what duty means, and prayer and spiritual fellowship and aspiration. Thus, as Mr. ILLINGWORTH himself admirably shows, the immanence of God in humanity begins to be manifest, and why should not the process of spiritual growth be continued and perfected, until there is nothing to cloud the vision or mar the communion of all living souls with the Eternal FATHER? The orthodox reply is that only through the help of an Incarnate God can this be accomplished; and yet we must persist in asking, Why not? for in spite of all that Mr. ILLINGWORTH has said, we are left with the clear conviction that the doctrine of the Incarnation, in the sense of "God becoming man," is "intrinsically irrational," and that our ineradicable shrinking from such a thought is no "baseless prejudice" or "irrational bias," but the strong insistence of a faith that has learnt with JESUS a religion of humble trust and surrender to the FATHER in heaven.

* "Divine Immanence, an Essay on the Spiritual Significance of Matter," by J. R. Illingworth, M.A. Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d.

Nor are we moved by Mr. ILLINGWORTH's plea for the doctrine of the Trinity as being "clearer than any adverse view," and as affording the only intelligible ground for attributing love to God as essential to His Being.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH indeed recalls the confession of the creed that in the Trinity the FATHER remains incomprehensible, the SON incomprehensible, and the HOLY GHOST incomprehensible, and admits that the analogy of the relations of family life must not be pushed too far, and yet he asserts without hesitation or qualification that "the doctrine of the Trinity is the sole metaphysic of love" and that the Unitarian conception of God leaves "no room for attributing love, in any intelligible sense, to the Divine nature."

The statement of the Psalmist, that "God is loving unto every man," does not of necessity imply that love is more than what may be called a relative and secondary attribute of God; an affection elicited by the existence, the ephemeral existence of His creatures, and which, apart from that existence, would cease to operate, and therefore to be. God in His unknown essence might still be something other than Love; but the statement that "God is Love," is very different from this: it is a real revelation beyond all that we could otherwise have learned: it lifts Love at once into the absolute, as the essential and eternal cause of all; thereby exhibiting the whole world in a new light.

And this revelation, in Mr. ILLINGWORTH's view, is given through the Incarnation, and the announcement of CHRIST that he himself is God made manifest and a person in the Trinity. For if love is to be understood as absolute in God, "there must of necessity be conceived a plurality of persons in the Godhead."

Now as to this we must first ask, By what right does Mr. ILLINGWORTH speak of any attribute of God as relative or secondary? Love in God, he suggests, might be (if it were not for the Trinity) an affection elicited by the "ephemeral existence of His creatures," which, apart from that existence, "would cease to operate, and therefore to be." Are we, then, to suppose that God first created, and afterwards began to love—and not rather that because of the love which in Him is essential He creates, and calls into being not merely ephemeral creatures, but those whom he takes into abiding spiritual communion with Himself?

In attempting to penetrate beyond the actual knowledge of our own human life with God we set ourselves to an impossible task. The Church claims to have received a special revelation, which has been formulated in the doctrines of Incarnation and Trinity, but for this we have failed to discover any true authority, and both the teaching of JESUS himself and the subsequent history of Christianity convince us that those doctrines are but attempts of the human spirit to fathom the unfathomable.

For our own part we know nothing of a "Divine Society" in the Godhead, but we do know what love is, and with assured conviction hold it to be of the very essence of the Eternal. We know also something of that Divine Society in the great Household of God, in which JESUS is "the first-born of many brethren," and in which we humbly trust, through the FATHER's infinite love, to have our own place, though it should be the very lowest.

We are not so anxious about the "metaphysic of love" as about its reality, for we entirely agree with Mr. ILLINGWORTH that it is "the sole solution of life's problem." And that is what we find in companionship with JESUS and in the child-like spirit which asks only that the FATHER's will may be done.

The bird that attempts a flight beyond the air which sustains its wing and is its breath of life is brought to confusion. Our life must for ever rest in God. In the Divine Immanence, glorifying heaven and earth, consecrating and sustaining the human spirit, we find the secret of peace and strength, undying hope, and that love in which must be perfected the true life of the children of God.

THOUGHTS FROM ITALY.

II.—THE GLAD QUARTER.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.,
MINISTER OF ALL SOULS' CHURCH, BELFAST.

"Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee."

"Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us."
—Psalm lxxvii. 5, 6.

LAST Sunday I said that religion—by which I understand love for God and love for man as the child of God, in a form enthusiastically approved by the thought of the age—was the initial and permanent impulse of Florentine greatness, and that this impulse came from the Friars. The Franciscans settled in Florence in 1212, making their home in a swampy district by the Arno, where the poorest lived; and the Dominicans, arriving eight years later, found a free field for their labours at the opposite end of the city. Between them, in the centre of Florence, was the old cathedral of St. John the Baptist, a small octagonal building on the site, probably, of an ancient Roman temple dedicated to Mars. This had served as the principal church of the city for something like four centuries. But in less than a hundred years after the coming of the Friars Florence underwent a transformation. With other Italian towns she threw off the yoke of the Teutonic nobles, gained freedom of government, and grew into a flourishing community. Civic and religious life went hand in hand. A common, deepening religious faith bound together citizens of different race and party. Politically, the Florentines were in hostile camps, as bitterly opposed as Unionist and Nationalist in Belfast; but religiously they were one. Every citizen, of whatever faction, was baptised in the old cathedral of St. John, and looked to St. John as the patron saint of the city. Guelph and Ghibelline, who were ready to stab one another in a political brawl, contributed alike to the charities and churches of the Friars, and joined in praise of the artists who covered the walls of these churches with frescoes. In 1252, when the Franciscans had been forty years in Florence, the fine gold coin was struck by her merchants, which became famous in Europe as the "florin," and bore witness to the solidity of their credit and the sincerity of their religion. On one side of it was the Florentine lily, and on the other the figure of John the Baptist. "At this time," says the old chronicler Villani, "the people were true and trustworthy to one another, and to the commonwealth, and with their simple life and economy did greater and more virtuous things than were done later in an age of wealth and luxury."* The growth of the city and the extension of her power demanded new public edifices. Walls, fortresses, bridges, palaces of justice and government, were built or rebuilt, the streets were drained and paved, and fine piazzas or squares with covered-walks (loggias) were made in the crowded centres; while three magnificent churches—the Dominican St. Mary's, the Franciscan Holy Cross, and a new Cathedral—were erected for the increased religious needs of the people. There was thus a call for architects. A German, Jacopo, had built a fine Gothic church over the tomb of St. Francis at Assisi.† He was invited to Florence, and he brought the Gothic style into the city. A pupil, some say his son, a man of genius, with the German name Arnulf, Italianised into Arnolfo, continued his work and designed many of the new buildings. The Palazzo Vecchio, Holy Cross, and the Cathedral were by Arnolfo and are among the best specimens of early Italian Gothic.

Now I mention all these particulars because I want you to observe how civic and ecclesiastic architecture sprang up together in Florence. The same impulse which erected churches and adorned them, paved and cleansed the streets, and cleared open-spaces for the people. The influence of the Friars did not limit itself to saving souls from an unseen Hell, or to building houses of prayer. It created also an industrious and upright citizenship, and made Florence a healthy and beautiful place to live in.

And I want you further to consider whether religion, as I have defined it, does not always awaken a public spirit; and whether, therefore, a faith can be called a true faith which confines itself to denominational success. After a generation or two of Franciscan and Dominican teach-

* vi. 69, cf. Dante, Par. xv. 103-105: "Florence . . . was abiding in sober and modest peace. She had not necklace nor coronal, nor dames with ornamented shoes nor girdle. . . . I saw Bellicion Berti go girt with leather and bone and his dame come from her mirror without a painted face." (Norton.)

ing the people of Florence, divided as they were by racial and social feuds, joined in the desire for a city which everyone might enjoy, in which nobles, merchants, craftsmen, and labourers might feel pride, and of which the poor might say with the wealthy, "This is our Florence."

No one, I think, can visit Florence without being struck by the splendid inheritance of the people. There are churches and halls, and towers and squares and gardens, and pictures and statues which are public property, the possession of every man and woman in the place. The art treasures of Florence, which are the admiration and envy of the civilised world, are not shut up in private parks or mansions for the selfish enjoyment of the few—if this can be called enjoyment. The public are not admitted to see them by the kind permission of any private person. Most of them are in the street. Giotto's Tower, with its glowing marbles and immortal sculpture; Brunelleschi's mighty dome; Ghiberti's bronze gates which Michael Angelo declared worthy to be the gates of Heaven; Cellini's statue of Perseus, della Robbia's children, and scores of priceless things, are, and always have been, in the open air, for every passer-by to look at, for every serving man and every schoolboy to see and love.

The highest art lives, and only lives, in the public sympathy. It perishes in the hothouse atmosphere of private patronage. The temples of Greece, the Norman cathedrals, the Doge's Palace in Venice, the frescoes of Giotto, the cartoons of Raphael, the poems of Homer, the plays of Aeschylus and Shakespeare, the music of Handel and Mendelssohn, the book of Psalms, were not produced for sectarian glory or private interest, but for public uses. And it can be proved up to the hilt that in Athens, in Jerusalem, in Normandy, in Venice, Florence, Rome, and London, art flourished with the growth of public spirit and declined with its decay.

But I fancy I hear some one say, "Is that true of painting? If it be granted that architecture and the drama, and perhaps music, depend for their highest expression on municipal and national interest, yet pictures are chiefly for halls and drawing-rooms." Unhappily, this is largely the case at present, and it probably explains why so much of our painting is insipid and frivolous. But in Florence, the home of many of the greatest painters the world has seen, it was not so. Florentine painting grew up directly out of Florentine architecture. New and large churches meant wall-space for the painters. In those days there was no printing. Books were few. The people could not read. What they knew of religion had to be gathered in the main from the preacher's lips. Now, the Friars had revived preaching; and the painter in Florence, and elsewhere, came to the help of the preacher. The great schools of Italian painting, like the English drama, originated in the desire to aid the preacher of the gospel. This may sound startling in Puritan ears, but it is a sober fact. The introducers of painting into Florence were Greeks, who were brought from Byzantium (Constantinople) to paint religious pictures on the new church walls.

Hence the earliest native school of painting in Florence is known as the Byzantine. The work of these Greeks left its mark on the city. It was very solemn, and very formal, according to ancient rules and with very little perspective or proportion, somewhat like Chinese painting now. Yet it was the best at that time, and the beginning of great things in Florence. One of the first places they decorated was the Dominican St. Mary's, where they were watched with eager interest by a boy in the monastery school named John Cenni, afterwards Cimabue. He left his lessons to be with them, covered his book with sketches of their work, and at last was received by them as a pupil. Then for years he diligently copied their strange allegorical designs, and painted the stiff draperies and angular joints of madonnas and apostles, until he thought he could do them as well as they could, if not better. His free Florentine nature began to rebel against this stereotyped art. Why should he merely imitate what others had been doing for ages? He belonged to Florence, not to Byzantium, and he did not see why he should be bound by their venerable traditions. So he struck out in a direction of his own. "I will paint the mother of God," he said, "as a real living woman." Instead, therefore, of looking for his model in the pictures of his foreign teachers, he studied the faces of the Florentine women, perhaps asked one to sit for him, and persevering at length produced a St. Mary different from anything seen before, a madonna of real flesh and blood, with something like a smile on her countenance and something like a real baby on her bosom, surrounded by worshipping angels. When the picture was finished, and brought from his garden to be taken to the church of his old friends the Dominicans, it was met by a crowd of people who hailed it with enthusiasm and carried it in triumph through the city. So remarkable was its reception that the neighbourhood of Cimabue's house, in the Via del Cocomero, was called, as it still is, the Glad Quarter.

A few weeks since I saw this picture in St. Mary's, and thought both of the man who painted it and the public who gave it their welcome. It is a poor, faded thing now, perhaps very disappointing at first sight. I daresay some of you would say it was hideous. But give it time. You must look at it with sympathy and patience before it will speak to you. Is that not true of many things? And then you will notice its very careful workmanship. Though it is about ten feet high and six feet broad, there is not a square inch of its surface which is not wrought, says Mr. Ruskin, "with the fineness of a Greek manuscript." It is at least a grave, solemn piece of art, the work of a man who would destroy whatever did not satisfy him, and who believed heart and soul in what he did, and made it an offering to the Highest.

Possibly, if you are a narrow-minded Protestant, you may say, "A madonna! what wretched superstition!" And no doubt it partly was. I daresay some of your beliefs will seem a wretched superstition six hundred years to come. But that does not greatly matter. The essential point is that you should have something of the great truth of God and should be in earnest about it; as you may see, in his picture, that Cimabue had something of it and was possessed by it. You have your way of thinking of God's love, and Cimabue had his. To him the Madonna represented the Divine Motherliness; and he loved it, and made others feel it by his art in those fierce days of strife and bloodshed. Madonna-worship, if you will read about it with an open mind, was an inestimable blessing to feudal Europe. It changed the savage Northman into a knight of chivalry, and raised the status of woman to a new level.

In the next place, though Cimabue was as serious as Raphael in his early period, we must not look on his work, as Mrs. Browning remarks, "from the heights of Raphaelhood." It is obviously faulty. The mother's head is too large; her child's is too small. Her hands and the child's arms are too long. Her robe is as stiff as if it had been starched. But compare her with the wooden, parrot-featured Virgins which preceded her, and she is beautiful! She has queenly grace, and dignity, and human sweetness. She is fit to be the mother of all the lovely Madonnas that came after—of Giotto, Fra Angelico, Andrea del Sarto, and Raphael. The sublime picture of motherhood which Raphael painted for the Grand Duke of Tuscany* is the direct descendant of Cimabue's Mary.

For, let us remember, Cimabue was the first who dared to go to Nature. How much there is in that! To go to Nature—to trust the work and ways of God, to believe in His truth rather than man's dogma—is the daring of all free and progressive souls. Every real advance the world has made has been a going to Nature, a turning from an old law to a higher, from an ancient human authority to a divine. Let a man have this daring in religion, political economy, science, or art, and who will say what it may lead to—what far-reaching consequences may follow from it? This thought in itself is a sermon, which the name of Cimabue should always suggest.

But I must pass on to what Cimabue's picture tells us of the Florentine people. They were proud of him, partly because he was their fellow-citizen and had outstripped the foreign painters, but chiefly, I believe, because he had given them something beautiful to love. It is evident that what was dear to the artist was dear to the people among whom he lived. He received his ideas from them, as a great artist always does, and gave them back to them in a form which kindled fresh emotion. Great art lives, as I have said, on public sympathy. To some extent, I suppose, though only to a very limited extent, a great scientist may dispense with human encouragement. He may bury himself, as Darwin did, and dispassionately work out his intellectual problems. But with the great artist this is impossible. His energies droop at once without fellowship. His work, springing from the heart, needs the constant touch of kindred minds. And this sympathy Arnolfo and Cimabue and Giotto had. Grateful to Arnolfo, the Florentines made him a free citizen. "You shall no longer be a German," they said, in effect; "you shall be one of us. We know nobody like you. You shall build our new cathedral. Let it be as noble as you can make it, and you shall have everything we can give." And in praise of Cimabue they threw up their hats and followed his picture in triumphal procession, and called the neighbourhood of his house "Il borgo allegro." Then when Giotto succeeded Arnolfo in architecture, and Cimabue in painting, they said of him, "Since our Giotto is without a superior in the world he shall build our new Bell Tower, and he shall do it as perfectly as he can. He shall have a free hand, and room for his fullest strength."

And you will observe, my friends, that the bond between artist and people in each case was not merely civil nor æsthetic; it was also religious.

Now of Giotto I shall speak next Sunday. This evening I want to say that Cimabue was his master. Cimabue discovered Giotto's genius and trained it until it surpassed his own; he loved him and rejoiced at his success; and he left in him his own tender, earnest spirit, and taught him, as not the least of his services, to fear God and reverence the name of St. Francis.

Probably you have heard how Cimabue found young Giotto, as he kept his father's sheep, trying to draw one of them with a sharp stone; and how he took him with him to Florence. That seems to have been about the year 1286, when Cimabue was about six-and-forty years old, and Giotto a boy of ten. So Giotto received his first lessons in Cimabue's studio in the Glad Quarter, and learnt how to draw and to mix his colours, and to study not his master only but Nature too. Then, in course of time, by wise instruction, which urged him to use his own eyes and freely exercise his own imagination, and by diligence and his own rare gifts, he outstripped his teacher, and, as Dante says, took away his fame:

"Lo, Cimabue thought alone to tread
The lists of painting; now doth Giotto gain

The praise, and darkness on his glory shed."

But the old man was not jealous—as the Byzantines had been of him. Margaritone of Arezzo, who kept to the old Byzantine manner, died, says Vasari, "infastidito"—tired out and disgusted—with Cimabue's success. Yet Cimabue, we are told, smiled "at the first stroke which passed what he could do." Giotto was dearer to him than before; and when he died he left him his property, including his house in the Glad Quarter.

This, however, was a small part of his bequest. The spiritual inheritance was far greater. When Cimabue went to Assisi to paint in Jacopo's Church on St. Francis' grave, Giotto, we may be sure, accompanied him; and he saw him, perhaps, at work on a madonna, which is still there, with St. Francis by her side. The portrait of St. Francis is very valuable, because probably authentic. Cimabue was born only fourteen years after the Saint's death, and doubtless he had particulars of his appearance from men who knew him.* Giotto also saw his master painting, in this church, scenes of the life of Christ, which, though much injured, still exist. In one of them, by rare good fortune—as if God had intervened and stayed the hand of Time—the face of the Madonna, weeping at the foot of the cross (a headless cross), is preserved. It is the most beautiful bit of painting we have of Cimabue, and Mr. Ruskin describes it as "the noblest to this day among all the Mater Dolorosas of Christianity."

I am impressed by the connection between St. Francis and the art of the Florentines. I love to think of the Northman Jacopo bringing to Florence its noblest style of architecture from Assisi; and of Cimabue, in his turn, being called from Florence to decorate the church of St. Francis. And I love, too, to think of Giotto, when Cimabue was dead, finishing what his master had begun at Assisi, and throwing all the seriousness and tenderness of his young genius into a great allegorical picture above the Saint's tomb.

Thus, in days of savage political feuds, which banished Dante and awoke the terrible revenge of the "Divine Comedy," the spirit of St. Francis spread. One evidence of it, not among the arts of Florence, but among its kindred charities, is so remarkable that I must mention it in this connection. A poor man, a contemporary of Dante, a porter named Peter Borso, in pity for the victims of pestilence and street-fighting, formed a small brotherhood among his fellow-porters to carry the wounded and dead, free of charge, to their homes or the hospitals or to decent burial. The brotherhood, known as the "Misericordia," grew; and to-day, after six centuries, it still carries on its work. It includes now every class of society from the king to the citizen. To conceal differences of wealth the brethren on their errands of mercy wear a black monkish robe with a hood over the face, holes only being left for the eyes. Thus their feet alone betray their rank; and often the heavy boot of the labourer and the shoe of the gentleman may be seen together. They are summoned in order by their chapel-bell. It tells twice for an accident; three times means a death. As quickly as possible they assemble at the chapel, and go forth with a litter. As they move in solemn procession bearing a sick man or a corpse the people stand and the men raise their hats. On their return to the chapel they pause, and the first pair say to the next "God reward thee," and receive the reply, "And thee also;" and when the salutation and response have been repeated all along the line, they pass in.

Thus the spirit of the Saint lived in the hearts of the Florentines, and lives yet after six hundred years.

THE GROWTH OF CHURCH ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND.—I.

THE comparison of an over-arching avenue of trees to a Gothic cathedral with its vaulted roof is so familiar as to be almost hackneyed. "Here," it has often been said, "we see where the architects obtained the first idea of an arched roof, and perhaps of the arch itself." This notion of a direct imitation of Nature in human constructive works has long been exploded. Man did not in the earliest ages watch the nautilus floating in his curved shell, and build in imitation of him a boat with mast and sails; nor did he go into the woods, and from the over-arching branches derive the idea of an arch and construct it in stone. But there is nevertheless a certain affinity between Gothic architecture and the trees which goes deeper than mere conscious imitation of form on the part of the builders. The cathedrals have grown, almost as a tree itself grows, and the root of Gothic architecture is in the ground in another sense than the actual foundations of the buildings themselves. The arch is the very life of all Gothic architecture. It is the essential feature which distinguishes it from the Greek and Roman. And the arch has its origin in the ground. The cloaca maxima, or great main drain of Rome, was an arched channel, constructed probably about 600 B.C., long before buildings with arches were constructed above ground. Some of the Greek temples have subterranean arches, though every line in the superstructure is straight, and no arch would have been tolerated by the architect above ground. When first the arch was used above ground it was not for the sake of its beauty, but purely for utility.

The great Roman aqueducts that conveyed water to Rome and other large towns were supported by arches. The Colosseum and other amphitheatres were huge piles of arches. And the arch, though it must not intrude on the temple, was good enough for the construction of a basilica or town hall. So it first sprang up above ground, either a plain round stone arch springing direct from the wall without columns, or a similar plain semi-circular arch springing from a massive column with a Greek or Roman capital.

Paganism and Christianity existed for a long time side by side. The Christians had first their own private places of worship, some room lent in a private house, or sometimes some secret place where they might escape the eye of the spy and the persecutor. But as the religion became recognised and allowed, the worshippers were allowed the use, not of a temple—which would be equivalent to lending the parish church now to an ethical society—but of a public building such as the basilica; just as an ethical society can now obtain some hall or public room.

In many instances the basilica was finally converted into a church pure and simple, and came to be used solely for ecclesiastical purposes. The great church of St. Peter at Rome was a basilica originally and on a plan of many churches in Italy; notwithstanding alterations and additions, it is still possible to mark out certain portions which show the plan of a complete basilica.

No doubt in some of the larger towns in Roman Britain, also, the basilica was converted into a church; but in Britain the pagan Saxon invasion swept away almost every trace of Roman civilisation, and we have now very little Roman architecture of any kind in England, and none that is Ecclesiastical.

With the second introduction of Christianity into England came church-building. In some cases the Saxon temples were converted into churches. Christianity and Saxon paganism cannot be said to have existed side by side as Christianity and Roman paganism did. What took place now was not the gradual growth of a despised sect in the midst of a civilised

* Cimabue's St. Francis bears a strong resemblance to that assigned to Giunta Pisano in the sarcophagus of the church. The eyes are wide and dreamy, the nose long, the mouth small and shut and determined; the ears are conspicuous; the face has a withered aspect, bearing marks of suffering, and is slightly bearded. Giotto seems at first to have followed this bearded type (as in the fresco of St. Francis feeding the birds at Assisi), and then to have abandoned it, making the face young and beautiful (as in the Bardi Chapel of the Holy Cross).

national religion that it was destined ultimately to supersede, but the rapid victory of a powerful religion from abroad and the extinction of the native religion of the country. Christianity this time swept away Saxon paganism as rapidly and violently as the Saxons had conquered the Britons and extinguished their religion, or driven it into the fastnesses of Ireland, Scotland and Wales.

The architecture of the Saxon churches had two sources—namely, Rome and England: the style and structure of the Roman churches based on the plan and structure of a basilica, and the style and construction of a wooden Saxon building. It was, indeed, at one time supposed that the Saxons had no stone churches, but only wooden ones, and that it was for this reason that they had perished and only the Norman remained. This, however, was not the case. There were very many substantial and handsome stone churches in the Saxon period, and portions of some still remain.

As early as the end of the seventh century stone churches were built at Wearmouth and Jarrow, and some portions of these remain incorporated in the Norman churches subsequently built there. At Wearmouth especially there is a very interesting rough substantial doorway in the tower, with square stone jambs, and a square impost which only required the later finish of rounding the jamb and moulding the impost to become a proper column and capital.

At Barton-on-Humber and at Earl's Barton in Northamptonshire there are pure Saxon towers, and the tower of St. Michael's in Oxford is Saxon in style and construction. The last of these was probably built after the Norman Conquest, but it is Saxon, not Norman work.

At Bradford-on-Avon in Wiltshire is a complete Saxon church, happily preserved by having been merely neglected after the building of the new church, instead of being pulled down to make room for it, and ultimately divided up and used as dwelling houses. As the building was inhabited, the roof was kept in repair, and the building thus preserved from ruin by weather, and now the partitions and additions have been removed, and it stands to-day as it did nearly a thousand years ago. Some of the Saxon work is very much more ornate and of better workmanship, more carefully cut and closely jointed stone, than the Norman work which followed it. The tower at Earl's Barton is covered with flat pilaster work in perpendicular and inclined lines and round arcade, and has an arcade of open balusters and round arches near the top. And there is good reason for supposing that there was a considerable amount of ornament within of an elaborate kind. But this, unfortunately, was swept away by the violence of the Norman Conquest, the desire to rebuild on a larger scale, and the reckless neglect of any attempt to preserve the older work.

"THE CHILD, THE WISE MAN, AND GOD."*

IN the still watches of the night I slept and dreamed dreams. I dreamt I was in a great and spreading land in the early grey morning. Mists were lying over hill and dale, but as the breezes stirred them I could now and again catch the shadowy outlines of hills and crags; could discern the dark masses of forests, and the silver streak of winding rivers. But these glimpses were so brief that I was often doubtful of what I saw.

Near by, however, I could see more clearly. Though it was early morn I was surrounded by busy life. Men and women in rude garments were passing swiftly to and fro, intent on finding the means of subsistence. Little children, in nature's only garb of innocence, played on the ground, or raced merrily over the sward. Hunters came from the forest with their slain prey; fishers brought strings of glittering fish; women brought wild fruits and herbs and roots torn from the ground. They that had game bartered with those that had fish, and both alike exchanged for fruits and herbs, so that each partook of the many kinds of food.

Savagery there was, and ignorance; craft and fraud, passion and revenge; but also rude signs of brotherhood and clan-ship.

Then arose some who said, "Whence and what are we? How is it that night follows day and day night; that babes are born and men die; that the stars shine in the darkness, and the sun rises at morn? What is this world, and what the mystery of being?"

And some scoffed at these as dreamers of dreams, and said, "It is enough that we are here, and eat and drink and sleep! What matters it whether there is aught else!"

But others whispered, "Yea! it matters much. An inner voice says, 'Seek ye the truth!' Tell us, oh, hoary elders, tell us what life means." Then one here and one there said, "We did not make ourselves, and, perforce, there are those that made us. Let us seek them, that we may win their favour."

And the mists lay dank and white around, so that no man saw clearly, yet through the mists loomed up shadowy hills and crags. Then some cried, "These are the gods that made us, and that stand looking down on our lives. Let us worship them." So they ran hither and thither and brought beasts and fish and fruits, and said, "The gods shall feast with us, and they will be pleased, and will bless us." So they feasted, and part of the feast they laid on fires of wood to be burned; and they said, "The gods have eaten and are contented."

Then I awoke for a while and thought of all I had seen, until sleep once more laid hold on me and I dreamed again.

The same land lay before me, but there was more light. The day had dawned; the mists were clearing, and the scene was wider and fairer. Again around me were men and women and children, and they wept. For in their midst lay their dead,

* A penny edition of Mr. Kernahan's brochure, "The Child, the Wise Man, and the Devil," has recently been placed on the bookstalls, where, no doubt, it found many purchasers and readers. cold and still. Old and young they lay, wise and ignorant, gentle and fierce, good and evil.

Then as the living wept they cried aloud, "Whither have they gone? These dead forms smile not, frown not. They neither eat nor drink. They know us not, nor answer when we cry, Whither has the life gone?"

So certain arose and said, "What we see is not all that is. There is life that no man sees. Those we knew, the brave, the wise, have gone from us, but they live unseen. Let us, then, know that the gods also are not stocks or stones; are not suns and stars, but live and are invisible. Let us still offer to them our sacrifices, and tell them of our needs. Perchance they are near us and will hear."

Then I saw and knew that the world, the world of man, which had been but as a child when first I dreamed, was growing towards manhood. It no longer demanded to see, and it began to perceive.

And amongst the wise men to whom the crowds looked for wisdom, one here and one there began to say, "Lo! there are not gods—there is only God! the One and Only."

But the multitude murmured against them, and would not depart from their old custom, but cried, "Nay, there be many gods, and we will worship each the god that we have chosen!"

So the few held their peace and said, "These people are not yet old enough to know the truth. Let them serve the gods of their imaginations for yet a while, and we will worship the only God."

Then as I dreamed I became aware in some strange way that there was One whom I saw not with my bodily eyes, and only faintly discerned by some inner sense, who was watching over the lands and the multitudes who dwelt therein. And the One smiled on them as they ran hither and thither, worshipping each his favourite god; smiled as a father smiles when watching the little children in their play and at their lessons. And I saw, as it were, a thread of light running from the heart of each of these worshippers, and all these threads ended in the heart of the One who smiled.

Then I knew that it was not the little earth-made gods that they were really worshipping, but that what was in their hearts, though they knew it not, was the Unseen, uncomprehended One. And He waited for them to grow, as a father waits for the babes to become men and women. When, therefore, the few wise men said, "Nay! He is One and not many," He smiled even more brightly, and the threads of light between Him and them shone in the early morning with so rich a glow that the land was filled with a new radiance.

Then I awoke and pondered until sleep again fell on me.

I was in a small land that lay by the edge of a great sea. A river rose in the north of that land, and it ran into a deep basin in the hills at the south; and the sun drew up the moisture of it, so that the basin grew no fuller. There were rocky hills and fertile plains, and on one group of hills was a great and glorious city, with a vast temple in the midst of it.

Then as I listened I heard that men and women and children all through that land were praising and worshipping the One great God. The temple was filled with throngs offering sacrifices of beasts and birds and first-fruits, and priests went to and fro in their midst, while singers sang His praises. Yet the priests bound heavy burdens on the worshippers; weaving fetters and chains over the whole of their lives, and threatening the vengeance of their God if they dared to break them and cast them off. And the One whom I saw not with my eyes, but discerned in my heart, looked sorrowful when these things were said, and yet smiled patiently over their ignorance, knowing that they were not yet fully grown.

But one arose in the midst of this people, and spake great words in their ears. He was, to their eyes, but a working man and one of themselves. He belonged not to the priests nor the elders and authorised teachers, but came from a country village which was of no repute. Yet many listened as he spake to them, for he told them gracious things about the One God, and about themselves and their fellow-men. As he spake, the fetters and chains burst asunder, and the heavy burdens fell from their necks, so that they stood erect and lifted their faces to heaven as they had never done before.

I perceived, too, that this one who spoke to them saw always clearly what I had so dimly discerned in my heart. He saw ever before him the smiling and tender face of the One who watches over the peoples. He saw the fatherly patience waiting for them to grow older and wiser; saw the threads of light which bound them all in one; saw that it was not the outer form, but the inner intention that made their worship of any worth at all. So he went about bidding the people look into their hearts, rather than look to the great temple, bidding them offer spiritual sacrifices to Him who seeth in secret and heareth the prayer of the lowly.

But the priests and teachers waxed wroth, and arose and slew him by a miserable death. And he died and went to the One who watches over the peoples.

Yet, though the priests could slay the man, they could not slay the things he had taught, because those who had heard and loved him told the multitudes the words he said, and what manner of man he was, so that many believed and were known by his name. But because the mists had not yet departed, and men saw not clearly, but dimly, they that loved this man the most, seeing him through the mists, did not always clearly comprehend what he had taught and what manner of man he truly was. So many imaginations mingled with their tale, and his sayings were often mingled with their own guessings. But the One who watches knew that they were yet little more than children, and He waited patiently.

Then methought a dense and terrible darkness fell over the lands. I heard the clashing of armour and the cries of the wounded and dying. I saw the lurid glow of great fires, and the reeking clouds of smoke. Temples tottered and fell, thrones were overcast, the gods of the peoples were discredited, and it seemed as if chaos reigned. Men cried, "Who shall show us any good? The gods are dead, who is there in heaven? Men are evil, who is there on earth? Give us a god or we die." Then, because they perceived not the face of Him who watches over the peoples, and because He seemed far away and silent, they turned to him, of whom their fathers had told them, and they said: "This man was so pure, so holy, so tender, so true, so wise, surely he was more than man." So they built temples and churches, and worshipped as Almighty God him who had been a helpless babe, suckled as other babes, and who had worked and lived and died as other men do. Yet I saw that the One whom I perceived in my heart, and who watches over the peoples, smiled and was well content, because, although men gave glory to one of His creatures rather than to Him who created him, in their hearts they no longer worshipped Power, but Goodness: they no longer feared a stern and vengeful King, but loved Love and adored Holiness. So He that watches knew that the child was growing into manhood, and He waited patiently.

But again darkness and stress and storm fell on the lands, and priests once more stood between the people and the man they worshipped as God, and bid them bring offerings and sacrifices that they might win his favour. And they told of horrible torments awaiting them who died unforgiven, and offered, for money, to gain pardon for the offenders. And the last state of the peoples was worse than the first, and terror lay on their hearts. Yet here and there were wise men and true-hearted women who worshipped Love and Goodness, and did not think of God evilly. And the lamp of truth never quite went out; and still the threads of light linked the hearts of the true believers to the heart of the One who watches and waits.

Then there arose a great storm of wind and lightning and thunder, and it drove before it the clouds and the mists, and the earth grew brighter once more. Yet it could not sweep away all the mists. Men still saw but darkly, nor did they yet perceive truly the One who watches and waits. But the Love and Goodness of him who lived and was slain, and whom they made into a god, shone out once more, and his words of wisdom were better understood.

So men grew better and sweeter; and noble charities, and just laws, and purer customs grew and spread.

Yet I saw in my dream that, to this day, only a few, one here and one there, perceive the face of the One, the Only One, who waits for the child to become a full-grown man. He is not angry that they serve and worship their brother-man, seeing that what they truly worship is the Love and Goodness, the Purity and Righteousness which they see in their brother-man. Yet he waits for the time when their eyes shall be opened, and their hearts enlightened so that they may see the face of their Father who is in heaven; who watches over the peoples from eternity to eternity.

And it seemed that I beheld that coming day, and lo, not one man alone but all men and women and little children were known as God's offspring, all were loved as partakers of the divine nature. And that one brother-man was loved more than ever before, because he had known his Sonship and had glorified it by his life and his love and his death. And instead of one Christ all were Anointed ones, and instead of one Messiah all were known to be sent of God. In that day which I foresaw, men loved their brethren because they knew and loved their Heavenly Father, and earth and heaven grew so close together that I knew not which was earth and which was heaven, for God was All in all.

THE DIVINE IN THE HUMAN.

BY THE REV. CHARLES G. AMES.*

The Divine is in the Human. The highest powers work in lowliest processes. The infinite forces—power, wisdom, love—are at our service. "Hitch your wagon to a star," quoth Emerson. If our life is geared into the true order, we are taken along—taken along, even through pain, loss, death; and nothing can do us real harm.

It must be that the creative Mind, the universal Life, is present and active everywhere and in all things; but this Presence can only be evident to those who share its illumination. As the Bible or any sacred utterance means little or nothing to those who are out of harmony with the Spirit that inspires, as the most glowing picture appears as a blur when not seen in the right light, so is any man's being obscured to himself till he is wide-awake and open-eyed. Even then, if he shuts his eyes again or drowns, or if his life is dulled by falseness or foulness, the vision fades, the light that was in him becomes darkness.

Said a Roman pope—I think it was Sextus V.—"I know that all knowledge is in my breast; but sometimes I lose the key." The Talmud teaches that, "before a child is born, it is taught the whole law; but an angel comes and lays a hand on its mouth, and it forgets all." Plato also held that our knowledge is a reminiscence—a re-collecting of what we had in a former state of existence. Others have supposed that experience or revelation merely brings to consciousness what is obscurely written in our nature, as heat brings out the half-obliterated inscription on a coin. It satisfies me to believe that there is some adequate provision by which the truth that is in the supreme Mind is imparted to the mind of man. There is a wise Teacher; and "he hath shown thee, O man, what is good." And as all beings and objects belong to one system, come from one Source, and bear the impress of their origin, it follows that when we really understand ourselves, we shall hold the key to all the rest. The study of man is the study of God.

There must be more in us than yet appears. The whole future life of the tree—the plan of its structure, the quality of its foliage and fruit, and the scheme of all the possible trees that may spring from it—must be laid down in the seed from which it is to grow. Further, in each separate leaf is represented the whole life of the tree—the vital energy that works in root and sap, in blossom and fruit. For the tree has but one life; and each leaf might say: "Through me know the tree. I and the tree are one."

Thus a fine observer detects the qualities of a man in his features, eyes, tones, movements, actions. We misunderstand each other because we are poor and unsympathetic readers, because we are blind to the meanings that lurk in forms and facts. Everybody we meet is covered, like an Egyptian obelisk, with hieroglyphic inscriptions. Physiognomists, students of palmistry, and mind-readers may make out a few of these mystic signs; but every one of us is a vast and growing library, to which each inward experience or outward action adds a line. The whole man is present and represented in each thought, feeling, and determination, as the whole tree is in each limb and leaf.

We get a hint of immense resources of knowledge, power, and virtue stored potentially in the soul, or forever coming to the soul from the infinite and exhaustless Fulness. It is like a rich inheritance belonging by right to the unconscious child, and into which he enters simply by growing. Are we not always in a process of "becoming"? Does not the whole creation "wait for the manifestation of the sons of God"?

Our feeble aspirations, our little faith, hope, and love, are the workings in us of the same creative power that draws the plant up from the seed and soil, that works in the egg to form a bird, which by and by shall soar and sing. So we read hopefully the sad story of human life in all its lower conditions and painful struggles, and we learn to believe that

In even savage bosoms

There are longings, yearnings, strivings
For the good they comprehend not,—
That the feeble hands and helpless,
Groping blindly in the darkness,
Touch God's right hand in that darkness,
And are lifted up and strengthened.

As we come into our true life we realise more and more that we are embosomed in the Perfect and Universal, that we are in open communication with the all-knowing Mind and the all-loving Heart. The Light that lighteth every man no longer shines in an uncomprehending darkness. If the scanty rays of sunlight that enter the little pupils of our eyes can give us fair and trustworthy pictures of earth and sky, why should we doubt that through our higher faculties we may have the vision of higher realities? Has not a marvellous light shined for us in the face of Jesus Christ, and in every other face or fact that we have really seen and rightly felt?

We need wonder no longer at the confidence of Jesus when he is reported as saying: "The Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him all things. All things are delivered unto me of my Father." If one child of God has advanced further than ourselves along these shining paths that are laid out for all His children, and if we are travelling in the same direction, how can we help being his followers? As he cheerily calls back to those who are below and behind him, and bids them come on, why may they not joyfully salute him as their Leader and Example, the Prince of Life and Captain of Salvation?

To follow him is no servile imitation: we must be true to the Inward Light as he was, for it is the same light which shines for all. "See thou imitate no man, save in the matter of faithfulness," was the wise injunction of William Penn. The mind of Jesus opened inward and upward like a firmament, and a Face bent above him like a Father's approving smile. It is by the warrant of experience that he bids us ask and receive or seek and find the same unspeakable blessing.

CULTURE, for its own sake, is the worst form of self-idolatry. Culture, as the preparation of self for the service of others, is as the preparation of a plot of ground entrusted to us, that it may bear a harvest in which many may rejoice.—Professor Gardiner,

UNDER THE RED EAGLE.—IV.

THE Johannisplatz is not the only market place in Bozen. A short street leads from it to the Corn Market, a small irregular space, into which an unusually large market sometimes overflows. From this again a narrow picturesque passage brings us to the heart of the town, the Lauben, as the quaint arcades are called, where in old times business was done with Swiss, Germans, and Italians, who all made Bozen a business centre. One great blow to Bozen trade has been the rise and progress of Trieste, with its grand routes to the north. But even now there is a brisk trade in wine and preserved fruit. The Lauben abound in old houses, old ironwork, old plaster mouldings which are very common in Bozen, and have a sort of rococo grace of their own. Just where the Lauben end and give way to the narrow Fleischgasse is the Fruit Market. This is not so much a square, as the broadened ends of two side streets. The stalls are ranged on each side with their light awnings. In autumn the abundance and splendour of the fruit make a charming show. There is a bronze fountain on one side, with a statue of Neptune; on this the pale, grey pigeons, perch and flutter, contrasting their soft hues with the vivid colours of the fruit—clusters of black grapes, relieved with bright red peppers, green and purple figs, rich peaches, varieties of melons and gourds, and here and there a gay group of autumn flowers. Imagine this under a brilliant depth of blue sky and sunshine that cuts definite black shadows on the white, dusty road. But trade memories and trade interests are not the only ones that haunt Bozen. In whatever direction we look we are sure to see one or more castles—some ruins, some still habitable—all of them with a store of history and legend. Go back along the Brenner road, and a few miles away the mountain wall to the right is broken by the narrow porphyry gorge of the Eggen-thal. Perched high up on the left, at the entrance of the gorge, is the castle of Karneid. Though still habitable, it is a grim gloomy place, springing out of wild rocks, and it has a wild legend of its own. Long ago there raged a great plague in the neighbourhood, and the lords of Karneid vowed a vow that if they and their household were spared, the men of the family would make grateful pilgrimage to Weissenstein, a mountain shrine to the south, where was a wonder-working image of Madonna. The castle was an oasis of health in the waste of disease, and in time the plague passed away. Then was the time for the pious pilgrimage, but the knights forgot, and lived feasting and rioting, rejoicing in their security. Suddenly the plague fell on Karneid Castle and the knights all died. But that was not the end, for, the night after they died the castle gates flew open, and out came a grisly company—withered bodies in black mantles, on pale horses; and the horses flew through the air straight up to Weissenstein, and there the doors flew open at dead of night, and the procession swept in and dropped with a rattle before the holy image, and next morning the priest found at the foot of the image a little heap of blackened bones. So the pilgrimage was accomplished. But pass out of the town on the opposite side, and follow the stone dyke that keeps guard over the Talfer. The broad gravel bed is often green with grass, bushes, and even trees. Streams trickle here and there, but most of the water has been diverted higher up to fill the conduits of the town. It flows in rivulets through every street, often under a covering of boards. The women bring their copper pots, or their clothes, kneel down, lift a board, and carry on their washing aided by conversation in the open street. From the Wassermauer, as the dyke is called, there is a pleasant prospect across the Talfer of the villas, gardens and hotels of Gries nestling under the Guntschnaberg. To the right you look down on vineyards and fruit trees, across the town and away to the mountains. You pass Schloss Maretsch which has its legend—a melancholy one. The daughter of the house, the fair Kunegunde, was betrothed to Theobald von Treuenstein, who went off to win his spurs under Barbarossa in the Holy Land. (I give the legend as it stands, though in Barbarossa's only independent crusade he got no farther than Asia Minor.) After long waiting and wearying Kunegunde was excited by the tidings that a Pilgrim had come to the castle with news from Palestine. He had much news of Knight Theobald—how he had won his spurs by valiant deeds, but also how he had taken to wife the lovely daughter of a Pasha. At this Kunegunde stole silently from the hall, while the Pilgrim revealed himself as Knight Theobald come to test his lady's truth. He had put her to too cruel a test. In her despair she had thrown herself from her chamber window and was killed. But there is one castle near Bozen full of pleasant memories. Follow the dyke to the end, pass between an ugly modern mill and a picturesque old castle, follow up the Talfer as the bed narrows, and just where it issues from the ravine of the Sarnthal see up above perched on a bare rock, guarded by a fine cypress, the beautiful Schloss Runkelstein. The rock was fortified by the Romans, but a castle on the same lines as the present restoration was built in 1388 by one of the great merchant princes of Bozen, Niclas der Vintler. The Vintlers were people of culture, lovers of art and music. Their castle was adorned with frescoes of the old heroes and of the story of Tristan and Isolde, and they lived among artists, poets, and musicians a joyous and reasonable life. The castle passed in 1500 to the Emperor Maximilian, who had the old frescoes restored. Since then it was neglected, and let go to ruin till the present Emperor of Austria had it thoroughly and carefully restored, frescoes and all, and then made a truly imperial gift of it to the town of Bozen, and any Sunday or holiday the charming open gallery in the court is filled with the Boznern, drinking modest measures of country wine, and in full sympathy with the words of Viktor von Scheffel here roughly translated:

"I triumph still, O Runkelstein!
'Twas a bright hour for me
When treading Talfer's rocky vale
I found the way to thee!"

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Capelybryn.—On Sunday last, Aug. 14, the annual meeting of the Committee of the Singing Festival of our Cardiganshire Churches was held here. Delegates from nearly all the chapels concerned were present. It was resolved that the next festival be held on June 6, 1900, in the new chapel at Pantydeafaid, and that Mr. W. Hefin Williams, Lampeter, be appointed conductor. The Rev. John Davies, Allt-y-placa, and Mr. Evan Evans, Llandysul, were chosen to be the presidents for the day. The resignation of the secretary, Mr. John Jones, Rhydown Mills, and of the treasurer, Captain Davies, Rhydown-fach, was received with much regret, and the following were appointed in their place:—Secretary, Mr. George Thomas, C.M., Newcourt; treasurer, Mr. Jones, The Shop, Newcourt. Captain Davies was selected for the post of Chairman of the Committee, in place of the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandysul. The proceedings were throughout of a most cordial and encouraging character, and boded well for the future success of this most praiseworthy institution.

Capel-y-Groes.—On Tuesday, Aug. 8, meetings were held to bid adieu to the retiring minister, the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, who intends entering Manchester College, Oxford, for a further course of study, and to welcome the new minister, the Rev. D. Evans. Two sermons were delivered in the afternoon by the Revs. W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandysul, and Thomas Thomas, J.P., the latter dwelling chiefly on the duties of the congregation towards the minister. After the sermon the new minister, on behalf of the congregation, gave expression to the feeling of sorrow occasioned by the departure of Mr. Jenkins, and the good wishes of all for his future success. The Rev. Thomas Thomas also spoke in the same strain. Mr. Jenkins briefly and suitably acknowledged. In the evening a sermon was delivered by the Rev. Arthur Thomas, Llandysul. At its conclusion the Rev. J. Davies, on behalf of the congregation, offered the welcome to the new minister. He was followed by Mr. J. Islan Jones, a member of the Cribryn congregation and a student of Manchester College, Oxford, who bore testimony to the good work done at Cribryn during Mr. Evans's ministry. The Rev. D. Evans suitably acknowledged the welcome, and expressed a hope that they, as minister and congregation, might be able to work together harmoniously. The meetings were well attended.

Pepperhill, near Halifax.—The band of workers connected with this little Bethel are to be commended for their praiseworthy and unwearied perseverance. Pepperhill is an isolated outpost of Unitarianism, situated in the somewhat scattered and hilly district lying between Shelf and Halifax, its difficulty of access being severely felt by the ministers and laymen of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, by whom it is alternately served. On Saturday the committee held an al fresco party in a field kindly placed at their disposal by Mr. Keighley, a member of the congregation. An attractive programme was carried out, including sports of various kinds, sale of flowers, and music by the Junior Black Dike Band. It is gratifying to be able to state that, along with the beautiful weather, the successful issue of this rural and happy gathering was greatly aided by the subscriptions and help rendered by friends connected with other denominations in the district. The proceeds, amounting to over £8, are to be devoted towards chapel expenses.

Trowbridge.—A handsome two-light window, placed in Conigre Chapel, "To the glory of God and in loving memory of Simeon and Elizabeth Marshman," former members of the congregation, was dedicated on Sunday morning. The window has been erected at the cost of their children, now in America.

WESTBOROUGH CHURCH, SCARBOROUGH.

A SALE OF WORK in aid of the Church Funds, on August 29th, 30th, and 31st, will be opened on Tuesday, the 29th, at 2.30, by J. COMPTON RICKETT, Esq., M.P., and on Wednesday, the 30th, by Mrs. MARILLIER.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PREACHING last Sunday in Westminster Abbey, Canon Gore took the two following texts: "The Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets" (I Kings viii. 23), and "They received not the love of the truth And for this cause God sendeth them a working of error (a strong delusion A. V.) that they should believe a lie: that they all might be judged who believe not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. ii. 10-12). Speaking first on the Dreyfus case, he said the eyes of civilisation were riveted on our neighbours, a nation endowed with the most glorious gifts of spirit and heart and intellect, and yet undergoing tremendous moral humiliation because fanatical hatred of the Jewish race had blinded it. There was fundamental wilfulness in that hatred and its accompanying determination to trample on all its elementary principles of justice, righteousness, and mercy to make a scapegoat of one unhappy Jew. Proceeding from this fundamental wilfulness was delusion, as the Bible indicated, all the highest motives of national duty and patriotism were prostituted to augment the original wrong. They must pray with all their hearts that before it was too late God would raise the spirit of righteousness in fuller force in that nation, that it might reverse the current of public opinion and save a people so glorious and so puissant from the slur of inextinguishable ignominy. Turning next to the situation in South Africa, while he had confidence in the firmness and conciliation of our rulers, he said there was another spirit among us, the proofs of which had been clearly seen in the leading articles of leading journals during the last few weeks. It was a spirit of vengeance for Majuba Hill and for other defeats which the tough race who governed the Transvaal had inflicted on us. It was a spirit which breathed the lust of domination and cried for war at any cost. There was fundamental wilfulness, a refusal to ask with sincerity what, in a matter touching our pride, was really righteousness and mercy. Here, as always, came delusion. The high name of patriotism and the associations which covered our moral responsibility were invoked to spur us the way we should not go. First the wilfulness, then the delusion and the lying spirit in the mouth of the prophets, from the prevalence of which he prayed that God might deliver us.

THE Bishop of London has addressed a letter to the Rural Deans of his diocese, requesting them to make known to the clergy his wish that they shall obey the ruling of the Archbishop in the matter of the ceremonial use of incense and processional lights. Unwilling clergy are allowed until the first week in October to comply with this request. The following is the main part of the Bishop's letter :—

The Archbishop, after hearing all that was urged on the subject, has concluded that there is no authority for these usages according to the existing regulations which apply to the conduct of divine worship in the Church of England. This being so, it becomes a universal duty to abandon these usages—they are matters which are in no way essential to Christian teaching, and they give offence to many. I know that habit counts for much in all things appertaining to divine worship. But I feel sure that the clergy and congregations alike will recognise the duty of obedience to authority, and also the equal duty of not offending their brethren. I should be obliged to you if you would convey to those clergy in your deanery who may have introduced those usages into their services, my request that they will quietly abandon them, and will explain to their people that they do so at my desire. It is the duty of a Bishop to consider what is best for the whole body of the Church, and before this general consideration personal preference must give way.

It will be interesting to see whether the Bishop of Rochester, whose authority extends over South London, and who is a pronounced High Churchman, follows this example.

THE Bishop of Hereford, we learn from the Guardian, proposes to start in his diocese a system of circulating book-boxes, especially suited for country parishes. His idea is that each box should contain about twelve books, and that it should circulate from house to house. Some resident—say, a farmer's wife—should have charge of the box for a period of two or three months for the use of the household and any neighbours. At the end of the period the box should be transferred to some other family in a different part of the parish, and so on. The Bishop offers to give one box to any parish where persons interested will provide two other boxes. As to the kind of literature to be circulated, Dr. Percival suggests that each box might contain two books on the Bible, or of a devotional or theological character; one volume of travel, or history, or general literature, one of poetry, two of biography, two on subjects of practical interest to country people, two novels, and two books for children. The price of a complete collection on this scale should cost, the Bishop thinks, not more than thirty shillings or thirty-five shillings to make the plan practicable and of general adoption.

THE Rev. Clay Maccauley, the representative of the American Unitarian Association in Japan, writes a jubilant letter to the Christian Register, telling of a great day at the First Unitarian Church at Tokyo. What happened Mr. Maccauley thus describes :—

The Rev. Kinza Hirai of Kyoto, known to many persons in the United States as an eloquent and distinguished participant in the sessions of the World's Religious Congress at Chicago six years ago, came to Tokyo that he might unite himself in membership with and occupy the pulpit of the First Unitarian Church, thus expressing his sympathy with the attempt the Japan Unitarians are making to help the Japanese people toward the attainment of the higher religious faith and life. The announcement that he would speak from our platform added so many hearers to the audience that our assembly hall was considerably overfilled at both morning and evening meetings. Mr. Hirai's subject was "Synthetic Religion." He is a very fluent, eloquent, and learned speaker; and it is needless to say that his appearance at the Unity Hall and his outspoken recommendation of Unitarianism as the movement through which the highest religious aspirations of the Japanese may find expression and direction made a profound impress upon the auditors.

On the same day it was decided to hold a mass meeting at Kyoto, where Mr. Hirai resides, and is president of a widely-known school for young men, and also to hold next October a general conference of the advocates of liberal religion at Tokyo. Mr. Hirai, although he occupied Unitarian pulpits in the States in 1893-4, was there as a Buddhist, and has hitherto avoided contact with the Unitarian movement in his own country, so that it is significant of the influence exerted by Mr. Maccauley and his co-workers that Mr. Hirai has now so cordially identified himself with them. Other prominent natives of Japan have also recently joined the movement, so that the outlook is full of hope. Mr. Maccauley concludes his letter (on June 2) : "Unitarianism in this country is now an institution, and Unity Hall is now the fortunate centre of energies that separately were directed toward the people's good, but in union are becoming of commanding and beneficent power."

AN old letter came into our hands not long ago, written by an English woman recently arrived in Boston. The interest of the letter is such that we feel sure we shall be forgiven for reproducing a passage from it here. It was written to a friend at home on the afternoon of Sunday, Oct. 6, 1850—that is to say, the Sunday after the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law in the United States. The writer is a native of a little country town in the Midlands, and had been accustomed to the quiet worship of Unitarians in an old Presbyterian chapel:—

"We went this morning to hear Theodore Parker. He preaches in a building called the Melodeon; it is used for lectures and such things in the week. The service commenced with a hymn, scarcely a word of which I could hear for noise among the congregation. However, they became more quiet when the organ and singing began. That I did not at all like, the singers seemed to be trying which could make most noise. At the chapel we went to last Sunday in Brattle-street, the music was beautiful. After the hymn Mr. Parker offered a very beautiful prayer, then he read a chapter from the Bible, another hymn, then the discourse, which was upon the praise of men and the approval of God. It was a beautiful discourse, so simple and truthful. I must not begin to tell you of it, or I shall fill my sheet. He had a lovely bouquet of flowers in a vase by him. Might they not often be placed by the pulpit? There has been a law passed during the past week, by which it is illegal for any person in a Free State to harbour or conceal fugitive slaves. Mr. Parker, after the sermon, spoke of this shameful law. Many of his parishioners, he said, were slaves, some who have attended his preaching regularly for months, and were not seen there to-day, afraid lest their liberty should be at an end. He spoke a long time most ably and nobly; he shall think it his duty by every means in his power to endeavour to do away with such a law. He is ready to help to conceal these wronged brothers, though the fine be 1,000 dollars, or imprisonment for six months or for life, or he should consider himself as the hired shepherd who would not lay down his life for his sheep, if he did otherwise. Although in church, as they call all places of worship here, the people began applauding him, but were soon silenced. I do so admire him, he is a man."

Of this same occasion a report was published at the time in these columns, taken from an American paper, giving more fully the words of Parker's fearless protest: "Shall I stand by and see some of my own flock carried off into bondage and do nothing to hinder it? Then call me infidel, a hireling shepherd; call me a false priest, a wolf in sheep's clothing. To a law framed of such iniquity I own no allegiance. Humanity, Christianity, manhood revolt against it."

THE August Abolitionist (20, Triangle, Bristol) publishes a remarkable address recently delivered at the annual meeting of the British Medical Association by Dr.

George Wilson, as President of the Section of State Medicine. The subject of the address was "Bacteriological Research and Preventive Medicine." A firm believer in the efficacy of vaccination, Dr. Wilson maintains that there is no true analogy between Jenner's method and the more recent methods of treatment based on the theories of the bacteriologists. Pasteur's antirabic vaccination he holds to be a delusion: "Koch's tuberculin cure for phthisis has long since been labelled as worse than useless." And he declares:—

I am prepared to contend that the indiscriminate maiming and slaughter of animal life with which these bacteriological methods of research and experimentation have been inseparably associated cannot be proved to have saved one single human life, or lessened in any appreciable degree the load of human suffering.

In another strong passage, Dr. Wilson accuses his profession of misleading the public as to the cruelties perpetrated on animal life in the pursuit of these methods. It is not in the mere operation of injecting a virus that the cruelty lies, but in the after-effects, which often involve "long-drawn-out agony" lasting for weeks or months, with no relief from any anæsthetic, and only death to make an end of it. If medical opinion moves in the direction of Dr. Wilson's matured judgment it will be an intense relief to those who are burdened by the thought of animal suffering inflicted in the supposed interest of man.

AN influential committee, says the Athenæum, is being formed for the purpose of commemorating the last stand made by the great Earl of Leicester for the liberties of England on the field of Evesham. It is proposed to obtain the necessary funds for erecting a monument to Earl Simon by a public subscription. Among the vice-presidents who have been enlisted by the Rev. G. Napier Whittingham, the vicar of Evesham, and hon. sec. pro tem., are the Bishop of London and several other prelates, a number of deans, and several prominent historical scholars, including Professor York Powell and Mr. G. Prothero, and the President of the Royal Historical Society.

In his review of the autobiography of Dr. Samuel Davidson, which we published last week, Mr. Agate referred to the humorous side of the doctor's character. An anecdote, not included in the book, but which Mr. Agate once heard from an old pupil of Davidson's, illustrates this. Staying in a friend's house, which had been lent to him for the summer he was accustomed to walk about in the garden in his dressing-gown. On one occasion a boy, who had got into the garden and was stealing apples was promptly caught by the doctor, who held him at arm's length, and instead of administering any other chastisement said the first Psalm rapidly in a loud voice, and in the original Hebrew, and then let him go. Released, the terrified culprit fled in desperate haste, and, needless to say, was never seen in the garden again.

At an informal meeting of the members of the Manchester City Council held last week, the present Lord Mayor having definitely intimated that he could not undertake a second year of service, a resolution asking Mr. Alderman Rawson to allow himself to be nominated for the position was cordially moved, seconded and supported. Mr. Rawson expressed his high sense of the honour the Council proposed to confer upon him and his deep regret that he was unable to accept it. At the same time he assured the members of the Council that it would be one of the proudest recollections of his municipal life that he had been asked in this cordial way to accept the office of Lord Mayor. On this the Manchester Guardian wrote:—"There will be a very general feeling of regret that Mr. Harry Rawson has not been able to accept the position of Lord Mayor, to which his colleagues of the Manchester City Council desired to elect him. Mr. Rawson has served the community for many years and in various capacities, and has been so closely and honourably identified with the Corporation that the inclusion of his name in the list of our Chief Magistrates would have been highly appropriate. - But if this is not to be, at least the manner in which the distinction has been pressed upon him is an evidence of the esteem in which he is held. Mr. Rawson, in his long connection with our City Council, has shown courage—a quality which Englishmen prize—as well as ability. He has not been afraid of unpopular causes if they were right. His influence has been with those who have sought to spread education and to brighten and purify the life of the city, and for these services he has the gratitude of his fellow-citizens."

MR. ARTHUR CLAYDEN, a younger brother of Mr. P. W. Clayden, died at Hastings on Tuesday after a short illness, having just entered on his seventy-first year. Mr. Clayden gave up business early in life, and devoted himself to public work. He aided Mr. Arch in the formation of the Agricultural Labourers' Union in 1872, and was with him during his visit to Canada. The letters Mr. Clayden sent home to the Daily News were added as an Appendix to his history of the Agricultural Labourers' Movement, "The Revolt of the Field." In 1878 he went to New Zealand to study the conditions of agricultural life in the colony and became a strong advocate of emigration. A second visit in 1881 extended to a residence of four years, after which he published a Handbook to New Zealand, having already published an account of the colony under the title "The England of the Pacific." In 1892 Mr. Clayden contested the constituency of Dulwich, as a Liberal, but was never in Parliament. By religious affinity he was a liberal Non-conformist.

EPPS'S COCOA ESSENCE.—A THIN COCOA.—The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—James Epps and Co., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

BESIDE STILL WATERS.

How much there is contained in those few words—“He leadeth me beside the still waters.” The image itself is beautiful, if our thoughts travel no further than the outward scene. The words call up refreshing memories of pleasant meadows stretching along the course of some tranquil river that flows on silently and never weary, spreading a rich verdure on every side; or perhaps they lead one down to the shore of a placid lake, the clear surface of which mirrors the woods and the encircling hills, and is itself the very emblem of a pure, unruffled spirit.

Anyone who has followed a stream down from its source in the mountains to where it reaches the level plain gets a new insight into the meaning of the still waters. Among the mountains the waters often are tumbled over rocks, there is the hurry and excitement of the cataract and rapids. Sometimes in a narrow gorge they are closely shut in and seem to be hard pressed in their effort to get by. But then you reach the plain, and as you yourself find the delight of threading the level meadow path after the exertion of a steep descent and the rugged mountain track, so the waters now seem to rest; though the noise of the waterfall may still be in your ears, the broad stream now glides by without a murmur or a ripple, and there is beautiful companionship between the wanderer and such a quiet friend.

“He leadeth me beside the still waters.” Who has not memories of which those words speak the truth, memories of sacred moments which come oftenest towards evening, when the earth is resting after the heat of the day, when there are no troubled thoughts, no unquiet passion, and in the stillness God is felt to be very near? The old sorrows may still be there, trials in the future will have to be met, the enemies are not all turned to friends. But there is something in the peaceful waters, the tranquil beauty of the scene, transfigured in the light of the setting sun, which enters straight into the soul. In the settled quiet of the place, overarched by the clear depths of the heavens, there is that which is more than all the trouble of the world—there is the peace of God.

At such a time there can be no trouble. Sorrows are seen in their true light; the chastening of the Lord is accepted without a murmur, and all its bitterness is past. A new confidence is breathed into the soul; for the trials that must come will not be met alone, there will be strength from on high. The memory of this sacred hour will rise up in less peaceful times, bringing back with it this quiet trust, this deep feeling of the nearness and the love of God.

So the restfulness of the green pastures and the still waters comes to be blended with deeper experiences of the inward life, and becomes an emblem of our spiritual rest in the Lord. And it is not only in the solitudes of Nature that we can find the beautiful quietness which speaks to us of Divine peace. There are other places in our human life where storm and trouble have no longer any power to penetrate, and where, if we may linger, we cannot fail to be refreshed and strengthened. A beautiful picture may bring back to us with wondering delight the peacefulness of Nature; and it may also show to us the peace of God in a human soul, expressed in a pictured countenance. This may sometimes be seen in the old ecclesiastical paintings. There, amid much that is quaint and even grotesque, and amid the stiffness of the art, which had not yet gained perfect freedom, you not infrequently meet with the face of some man or woman in which there is that quietness which signifies inward rest; not the rest of purposeless inactivity, but of accomplished purpose, of inward discipline, of a soul that has learnt to trust and to look with wise and patient eyes upon the world.

Very wonderful in this respect is the face of Dante, as painted by Giotto on a frescoed wall in Florence. In that countenance are traces of mental struggle and sore trial; there is a fixed sadness of expression, the world can never be very bright again for him; but at the same time it is evident that the man has conquered, and has reached a haven of inward peace. We can understand how from his deep experience he may have gained visions of divinest beauty, and how, although he has been down to hell, he is yet no stranger to the bright regions of paradise. To be able to look on such a countenance as that, to be often reminded of such strength and purity of soul, is to be led beside still waters.

And what one sees in some of these old portraits is found also in the books written by such men, whether in modern or in olden times; especially in the books of devotion and the best sacred poetry, in which the quiet contemplation, the wisdom, the faith, the deep love of the writers are expressed. There one is admitted into the inner sanctuary and may read something of the secret converse of the soul with God, and get some insight into the sources of inspiration, and the gladness and quietness of heart which there prevail. It is the same when happily a more personal record has been preserved, when in letters to friends or in journals meant for no other eyes we can read how the trials and sorrows of life were met, what words of tenderness and consolation were sent to those in distress, what brave and cheerful courage ruled in them. We share for a time their broadness of view, the quiet confidence with which they speak; we are invigorated by the holy air they breathe; we marvel at the “rich full stream of heavenly grace.” Happy, indeed, are they who are often led by such still waters of the deeper life.

Then, again, among our living friends it is not impossible that there may be those our intercourse with whom will have a like restful and uplifting influence.

There are some homes on which the benediction of Divine peace always seems to rest, where there are no jarring notes of pride or selfishness, but everything breathes harmony and cheerful friendliness for all who come within its reach. There a man who has been battling in the world may lay aside his arms and be at rest, secure from harm in the freer, purer atmosphere, delighting in the friendship which is without guile, in the companionship of noble thought and purpose, in the love of what is beautiful and good. In such a home you may be sure is one who has known the good and evil of life and in the power of God has conquered. Then the strong faithfulness and love which make the home are able to guard it from the storms which are inevitable in the world without, and can make peace for those who come in.

Such influence we often see exercised in a beautiful old age. When the evening of life is come and the time of strenuous labour past, there are sometimes granted those hours of quiet resting, with grateful memories of the past, still fresh enjoyment of what is good and beautiful in the present and tranquil expectation of what the future may reveal. One who enters on such a season of life has a tranquillising influence on all about him. His quiet wisdom speaks with tender reproof or encouragement to the young; the experience of long years enables him to see the real value of the various aims that rouse the eagerness and passion of men; when he is by it is not so easy to think unworthy thoughts, to be impatient or despondent; mere worldly ambition is put to shame: it is clear what are the true foundations of life and its abiding treasures. It is a privilege to have the friendship of one who has thus passed through the storms, and is now gently borne along by the closing years towards the haven of rest. Where there is such a presence in a family, uniting all, the children and the grandchildren in one bond of common love and reverence, to come within its reach is to be led indeed beside still waters of the heavenly life.

These are some of the quiet places of our human life, which those who have to bear the burden and heat of the day do well to visit, as they have opportunity.

A GOOD EPITAPH.

THREE months ago I was spending a few restful days in the heart of some of the most beautiful scenery in Wales. Our temporary home was situated in an idyllic spot by the bank of the river Dee, whose waters made music incessantly as they beat themselves against the rocks, and hurled themselves torrent-like through the narrow gorge. The Sunday evening we spent there was quiet and peaceful in the extreme; the great hills all around seemed sheltering barriers against all that might otherwise mar the restful and perfect beauty of the scene. The clouds were tipped with a sunset glory; the shadows were lengthening, and here and there great shafts of golden sunlight come streaming down the valley, lighting up the May foliage wonderfully, and recalling to one's mind those pictures of one's childhood, wherein the gates of heaven were opened, and a dazzling effulgence poured down upon the world from the great Source of all light. We wended our way into Llantsylilo Churchyard. Vesper service was being held, and we could hear the choir chanting the psalms; but the words were in an unknown tongue, and so instead of entering the old church and listening to a service in which one could not possibly join, we preferred to listen to the music of the birds and Nature's own evening song of praise. We walked round the graveyard, and meditated amongst the tombs. Weird old yew-trees—whose ages could be counted by centuries, and which, doubtless, stood there when Madog, the hypocrite baron of Dinas Brân, saved his conscience and fattened his purse by founding the Abbey in Valle Crucis, and dedicating it to St. Mary; and no doubt its round-paunched monks were found fishing on Thursdays in the well-stocked pools of the river Dee. But this was 700 years ago, 360 years ago

King Henry VIII., in a spirit of rebellion against the Pope, and disgusted also with the immoral abuses of the abbots, dissolved this and other abbeys in England and Wales, and much of its fabric was carried away to enrich the churches of the neighbourhood.

But to return to Llantysilio Churchyard. What tales of joy and woe those old yew trees could tell! Many a wedding party issued from the lych-gate full of hope and happiness; aye, and many a coffin rested in that same gateway on its journey to the grave prepared for it in the rocky hill-side, while mourners stood around feeling that henceforth the world was to be a friendless and dreary place for them, and the task of winning bread a very hard one. We inspected the tombstones. Rich and poor, old and young were buried there. We saw the name of one Manchester man who had built up for himself a gigantic and world-famed business, and had secured for himself a sumptuous residence in one of the most beautiful valleys of Wales, and yet he could not shirk the summons of death when it came; and, on departing from this world, he could take none of his wealth with him; and now his merit has been judged not in accordance with his banking account, but in accordance with the way in which he grasped his opportunities of growing rich in spiritual, moral, and intellectual possessions.

There was one tombstone, however, which I want to speak somewhat specially about. It stood under the dark foliage of a grim old yew tree, and in a corner of the churchyard, commemorating the death of Exuperius Pickering, who died in 1857. On it is engraved an epitaph which was composed by this man only a short while before his death, and it runs thus:—"Here, in peaceful silence, rest the remains of a man who never rose from his pillow in enmity to any human being; who he was it is needless to name, for if the kind recollections of his friends embalm not his memory, a tomb to record his name were vain indeed." I did not regret not having gone inside the church to the service in Welsh; for here was a sermon in English, brief but eloquent, teaching a great lesson which so many men fail to learn in a long lifetime. Think of it. It was written by a man who knew he had not long to live, and who faced the mysteries of the future boldly and without dread because he had tried to faithfully discharge the duties of the past. He was summing up his life, and though not claiming to have achieved this or that which the vain world accounts great, was able to say that he was the enemy of no human being; that whatever feelings of displeasure and harshness he had towards any of his fellows at the close of day, he banished them in sleep, and awoke next morning bearing enmity towards no one. What an enviable condition of mind for a man to be in habitually!

Suppose one of us were starting next week on a voyage round the world, how should we like to feel it possible that during our absence nobody would ever think about us, or if they did, thank God we were out of the way ten or twelve months, and that during that time at least, they would have some peace and quiet? And so, too, no man likes to feel that when he dies no one will regret his departure. So strong is this desire to be remembered, that some men leave much money for the erection of costly and enduring monuments over their graves, in order that even centuries hence the wanderer amongst the tombs may read—"Here lies the body of So-and-So, who in life was, and did this, that, and the other," and so on; but there, reposing in Llantysilio Churchyard, is one man at least who in life desired not a monument of such a sort; but, on the contrary, confessed, a short while before breathing his last, that vain were a tombstone to record a man's name, if his memory be not embalmed in the kind recollection of his friends.

CHARLES ROPER.

THE SUMMER SEA.

WE have been playing with the gentlest of giants. The fields are dry; even the marsh-mud has dried, caked together, cracked and gaped. The pastures are no longer green. It is almost dusty to walk along the downs. Here and there we have found fairy-land again in those glorious old quarries where tender verdure still shelters itself from the heat, and blossoms, blue and white and purple, welcome the butterflies each to its own tint and shade. But the land's best has been said for awhile; we have turned to listen to the sea.

All through the twenty-four hours it is variously vocal, this most enduring, freshest element of our world. Gentlest of giants in these summer days, it has had no passion, no anger—nothing for us but smiles and peace, or at most the frolics of a big playfellow. At night, under the great populous sky, clouded with stars, it dimly hummed and rumbled, but never snarled, never approached a roar. In those coolest hours of dawn, when it lay green and grey under the faint mists, it lapped the beach meekly as if waiting for human-kind to wake once more. Then welcoming us, its tiny playfellows, again, it filled every hour till bedtime with some new delight.

When I saw the wide bay fringed league after league by white cliffs, and receding on the other side into the indefinite expanse of the great deep, the glorious fulness of its blue, flecked here and there with brilliant foam, pleased all the child in me; and yet the man in me, bringing to present sense the supplement of remembered knowledge and busy imagination, could but look wistfully on so obvious a parable of the eternal, the beyond, the unfathomed, unmeasured. Why be so waywardly wistful, when what we want is so near at hand? Down to the beach, to the pure broad sands, down to just such breadth of the sea as a little mind can take in and reckon with—the mere breadth, if you will, between two of these spiny groyne, that span outward all along the shore. Here, in such compassable limits the sea-mystery withdraws awhile, and the real playfellow runs up, stride after stride, to meet us. "Off, you lendings" we cry, happier in time and place than poor old Lear, whom we reverently thank for giving us that word. Splash, splash, plunge, roll, dive, float, breast the mimic waves—what will not our bright and happy friend permit, invite us to? He supplies enough motion for fun; he is still enough to let us see the dappling sands, ribbed and wrinkled, deep below. Breast and float, dive, roll, plunge, splash, splash—and not a thought of city swelter or rural dust comes, nor need, to heighten the delight by contrast. Enough to revel in the instant happiness, enough to live, glad to be alive, without reflecting why or how, or in any interrogative mood whatever. Whether we shall in consequence philosophise better when we sit clothed and in our (conventionally) right mind, let us see, let philosophers debate; but it is good to have an hour of life itself, unconsumed by self-criticism.

Then the sun-bath! To lie sufficed with the fervid glow, sufficed—no more, however fervid it be; thanks to the healthful effects of that sea-baptism, thanks to the Orient breeze that fans the cheek, not with the mechanical service of the Oriental slave, but with a freedom like that of the sea it crosses hitherwards. Our fathers spoke of one's having the "vapours," when more or less indefinable uneasiness of mind afflicted them. We have parted with the word, but, alas! it is not so easy to get rid of the thing. Here, surely, on this pebbly ridge, where besides those two boundary groyne there is nothing in sight of the vexatious world of man, but shore and sea and sky are all, and the August sun shines as only it can shine—here is the place to exhale all such vaporous ailments, being cleansed through and through by these clear and penetrative beams. Here, surely, is the place where he who in good earnest has flung away, for the time at least, that world which is "too much with us," and has frankly come to Nature for what is most truly his, and to find his heart again, so nearly given away, can see (I am prepared to believe) just as the Greeks did, even if he may think some things—thanks to them in great part—better than they did. Now that I am in tune for the loveliest melodies Nature has to sing to me, for "This sea that bares her bosom to the" sun, and for the breezes that are as little like "howling" as can be, Proteus himself may rise yonder from the white-flecked distance, and I shall hail him without the least incredulity or irreverence. Here, where the wide curling waves come up the sand, snow-crowned, sapphire-translucent in the gleaming sunshine, Aphrodite, pure from her birth amid the foam, shall meet and entrance my thought; while, all around, the "countless laughter" of the sea shall tell me that the joy of Nature is not dead, however much I and my brothers, in foolish wisdom, have helped to kill it. . . .

Of such hours were our holidays made. We had our sea-garden, not composed of the dead, desolate wrack swept together by storms, but living and growing there betwixt high tide and low, folded modestly in sleep at the ebb, but awake in beauty when the waters flowed, waving to and fro in exquisite lines of grace, marvellous in delicacy and in subtle tints, sheltering who knows what strange and teeming multitudes in its sea-shades, silvery fish, purple anemones, and—of course—hosts of crabs, the oft unwilling comedians of the shore. We had, also, our studio of colour, wide as the heavens and earth around, many an evening flushing with rosy lights the low-lying impalpable vapour, till sky and water blended into one magical haze, through which the white sails of the yachts passed silently to and fro like blessed spirits. Or sometimes—for all was varied in the invariable summer serenity of the time—the perfect clearness of noon persisted till night; and so much light lay along the land at sunset that, even though stars were beginning to appear, a neighbour skylark would spring up for one more irresistible song. Or later, when the sun was gone, indeed, and his amber bower glowed from beyond the gentle wave-curve of the downs, we saw the golden reflections break up, here and there, from the brackish streams and pools on the western flats—as if to tell us once more that there is nothing so low that the glory of the highest may not visit it. Then came thoughts of a little inland “sea” far away, and of One who walked beside it and who never seems far away when the heart is lowly, and man is happy in God.

I suppose the longest and most glorious summer will come to an end; and storms will darken that sea, and we shall be in populous city pent, and have to breast in earnest our share of a sea of troubles. Whatever comes, we shall never, let us hope, get into so deep a valley but that we may thence climb high enough to look back with ever-renewed delight and gratitude upon this shining time by the summer sea. We, too, shall reach the ridge and cry in our hearts, new-inspired, like the weary warriors of Greece: θάλαττα, θάλαττα—“the sea! the sea!”

W. G. TARRANT.

THE POETS.

THE poet is always here and always has been. Look into the histories of nations and peoples, and, from ancient times till now, the poet or the bard has always been. That is a significant fact. Nature, evidently, or the Maker of Nature, knows that he is always and everywhere needed; for always and everywhere the poet arises. The poet came long before the historian, the story-teller, the philosopher or the artist, or the musician. Indeed, to those early peoples the poet was all these things. It was as poetry and song that he recorded, and repeated for their information and encouragement the people's history, experience, and heroic deeds. Yes, the poet is a universal power and personage in this world. To give a list of the great ones would be to mention all nations and nearly all centuries. The Jews had their Psalmists, the Greeks their Homer, the Romans their Virgil, the Italians their Dante, the Persians their Firdusi, the French their Victor Hugo, the Germans their Goethe—and, to come home, the Irish have had their Moore, the Scotch their Burns, and we English our Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and others. Singular, significant fact—is it not?—this perennial presence of the poet. There is some purpose in it evidently. Nature and God mean something by it. A thing so universal and continuous is not of chance, but design.

Now, glance at another point. I mean this: the origin of the poet. Can we account for it? Tennyson was one of seven brothers. Why were they not all poets? Why should he, not the oldest nor yet the youngest, become England's great poet. Alfred Tennyson himself says that his older and dearest brother Charles “might have won the poet's name.” Indeed, they two as boys published a little book of “Poems by two Brothers.” But Alfred became the poet. Why? We know nowadays a great deal about heredity and environment; and no man's biography is complete which does not give us some knowledge of his father and mother, and of the early surroundings. But, for all that, we have not solved, nor shall we ever solve, the mystery as to the origin of genius. Evolution explains much, but not just this. True, the Rev. Dr. Tennyson, Alfred's father, rector of Somersby in Lincolnshire, and also of Grimsby, was a tall, striking man, remarkable for great strength, accomplished in many ways, and “something of a poet, painter, architect, musician, and also a considerable linguist and mathematician”; and the mother was “a sweet and gentle and most imaginative woman; so kind-hearted that it had passed into a proverb; and intensely, fervently religious.” And there you have a beautiful blend. But given the blend, is the poet sure to come of it? No, no; we have not yet got at the secret of making poets. It remains a mystery as to how they unexpectedly arise. The poet is neither made nor bred, but born. And so a Whittier springs up on a Massachusetts farm; a Browning in London; Shakespeare is born of a woolstapler in dead-alive Stratford-on-Avon in Warwickshire; Tennyson in a Lincolnshire rectory; Carlyle in a Scotch stonemason's cottage; Burns in a poorer cottage still. Tennyson was never poor, Burns was never rich; Whittier and Burns were no scholars; Carlyle, Browning and Tennyson were true scholars, cultured and learned in every sense. Whittier and Tennyson loved the beauty and quiet of the country; Browning and Lowell loved the roar of London, and the delights of its social life. What varied men! What varied ancestors! What varied circumstances under which they were born! Yet they were all poets. How came they? What caused them? The origin of the poet, the genesis of genius, leaves us, the more we look at it, pondering, wondering still. Perhaps when we have well considered what that mystery implies—that the great poets are of God and not of man—sent with a mission and message—we may still wonder, and even do more than that!

But let us ask another question. What is the poet really? He is always here. Nature evidently takes care that he shall be. His coming is a mystery yet unsolved. But what is he? Let us see.

All great things are difficult to define. And the poet is one of those great things indefinable. We know, we feel, what a great poet is, as we know and feel what God, Nature, and our own life are, yet we cannot fully or fitly name the fact in words.

“The poet,” it has been said, “is a thinker in images”; in other words, he is not only a thinker but a clother of thought in imagery—in the great language of the soul—whose very texture and tone are music and beauty. A friend of mine, a business man, once told me that he always found himself rising into Bible language whenever in speech his thoughts took a high range. We all reach a higher style of language whenever our minds are moved by a higher strain of thought. This is as it should be. It is natural and universal. But how seldom it comes to us? How difficult for us even to approach it? Our intellectual eye is not usually penetrative, our moral vision is not often sure and far-seeing, even had we the tongues of angels wherewith to tell, or pens of magic with which to write. But here comes the poet—so constituted, so specialised, so set apart and so self-trained, that in intellect and heart, he has the seeing eye and the saying power. Yes, that is the best description of the poet we can give: he is the seer and the sayer of the meaning and music of things. He sees what we do not, until he tells us; he says what we cannot, until he says it for us. Then we can see and say the same; and thank him for showing us what was there all the time, unrecognised by us until he opened our eyes; and inexpressible to us even then until he taught our tongues fit words in which to clothe the fact revealed.

And here we touch our final question: Of what use is the poet to us ordinary workaday mortals? I will tell you: “That the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed.” That, I think, is what the poet exists amongst us for. We are busy—busy here amid bricks and mortar; busy at the daily work that must be done, for the weekly wage that must be earned. But is this life, human life as it ought to be, as we want it to be? Is there one of us, however ignorant, that can be content to be a mere wage-earning machine or a mere day-dragging, night-resting horse? We are men and women; we have minds and hearts; and life is not worth living if thought and feeling are left out of it. Nay, we know by experience that the seat and source of life's enjoyment is the state of our mind. The more beauty we can see in Nature, the more meaning we can see in the drift of the world's life, the higher the ideals we can catch and live up to, the more we are moved and quickened to reach the better things we know—the happier and more satisfied we are. And who, in modern days, is it that, more than any other, teaches us, and touches us to these things? It is undoubtedly the great poets who do this for us. No, we may never read them; but they reach us all for all that. Like magnetism their influence passes from few to more, from more to many, from many at length to all. We hear, we read, we come in contact with those who are in contact with them. Thus are the poets the openers of all our eyes, the charmers of all our hearts, the nervers of all our wills. It is not that they are so different from us; it is because they are so like us, that they reach and help us so. The thoughts of their hearts are the best thoughts of ours, but we are dense, and busy, and distracted. The poet is clear, keen, still, concentrated, enlightened, inspired. He is our seer and sayer. He opens our intellectual eyes, purifies our moral vision, kindles our minds, fills our hearts. By the power he wakens in us we look through material things to the spiritual meanings and realities. Our common life, our national history, our existence here on earth—“this bank and shoal of Time”—islanded in eternity,—our little life here takes on a largeness and a glory when we catch the poet's revealing.

“Blessings be with them, and eternal praise,
Who gave us nobler songs, and nobler cares—
The poets, who on earth have made us heirs
Of truth and pure delight by heavenly lays.”

THE VISION OF PIERS PLOWMAN.*

AMONG the somewhat shadowy dreamers of mediæval England there is, perhaps, no figure more interesting in its hazy outline than that of Langland, the author of "The Vision of Piers the Plowman," whom M. Jusserand has made the subject of one of his studies in English literature. In this fascinating book we are enabled to picture not only dreamer and vision, but can transplant ourselves to the beautiful lonely Malverns as they lay quiet and open to the summer sunshine, and wandering with the poet along the grassy slopes, behold beneath us the "fair feld ful of folke," which to him was so real and significant.

With a literary analysis of the different texts of the poem it is not the purpose of this article to deal, but rather to show how M. Jusserand, because he is a Frenchman, has caught the true spirit of the scenery, society, religion, and recreation of an England, in which the Norman element must have predominated in Court and Church life, while the Saxon substratum of the common people contributed its more solid and home-loving quality.

So far as his examination goes, M. Jusserand comes to the conclusion, that William Langland was born at Cleobury-Mortimer in the county of Shrewsbury, not far from Malvern in the county of Worcester; that he was of lowly parentage; was educated through the kindness of friends, and became a freeman by entering the Church and taking the tonsure, though he afterwards barred his progress to preferment by marrying; and that, as a means of livelihood, he, against his conscience, became a chanter in one of the numerous chantries of St. Paul's Church, London, near which he resided with his wife Catharine and his daughter Nicolette, and, perhaps, added to his income by transcribing letters and charters.

So real does the man become to us, that we can picture him to ourselves, gaunt and grief-worn because compelled to live by a practice which he cannot but condemn, passing in and out among the crowds of Cornhill and Cheapside, elbowing merchants and friars, lords and mendicants, ladies and troubadours, yet conscious that these were but phantoms, and he himself the greatest unreality of all; until at times there seized him the insatiable desire to breathe once more the free air of his native hills; and above the roar and din of voices and traffic, he heard the rustle of the wind amid elm and beech-trees, the burn tinkled down in rippling music between banks of forget-me-not blue, the lark sang overhead in the sunny Midland sky, and the craving working like madness, so that people beholding him exclaimed, "He is a fole and mad," he is compelled once and again, either in reality or imagination, to betake himself to his beloved Malverns, the land of his childhood, now to become the landscape of his Vision.

And how true this is to our English nature to-day. From the city where wealth may be accumulated, from America and the Colonies, come men rich and prosperous, or toil-worn and sad, drawn by an irresistible impulse to some tiny hamlet perched amid lonely hills, or to some humble village set among fragrant meadows fringed by waving woodlands, but which has for them a magnetic power of attraction which no other spot of earth can possess, and which craving, if it cannot be satisfied, creates for the poor man and the exile a heart-sickness beyond the imagination to describe, or the power of physician to heal.

But back among the familiar scenes, pacing the lonely hill-side, the phantom figures of London become realities to Langland. Church life, political life, social life; the intrigue and by-play; the cruelty, suffering, sorrow; the sinner and the saint—all is spread out for him upon the plain stretching away before him; but perhaps because the crowd is a silent one, and the landscape unconfined by human limitation of street and town, he is able to see things in their right relations, and judge of the false and true by a more righteous judgment.

The man is melancholy, with the subdued melancholy characteristic of the Saxon, we feel it at every turn; he is also serious, with the seriousness of a great conviction; but the England in which he lives, the country itself, is the sunny England of Romance; and it is here that the great charm of M. Jusserand's book is most felt. The people might be "lewd" (wicked), the times bad; war had devastated and plague depopulated the land, but it was nevertheless a sunny land, a land of singing birds and unpolluted streams, and the vision shapes itself

"In a somere seyson whan softe was the sonne," and Langland tells us how, pausing beneath a linden, he listened to the concert overhead—

"And thus I went wide-where walkyng myne one (alone),

By a wilde wildernesse and bi a wode-syde.

Blisse of tho' briddes (birds) abyde me made

And under a lynde (linden) uppon a launde lened I a stounde,

To lythe (listen to) the layes, the levely foules made."

And with M. Jusserand we hope, that at the close of an unsuccessful and far from happy life, he was able to leave the city of his sins, sorrows, and repentances, to end his days under the sweet-scented lindens of his Western Hills.

The Vision itself is full of interest, and will repay the most careful study, not only for the picture of the times given therein, but for the combination in the author of many elements which have since been thoroughly amalgamated in the English race. As we have noted, his melancholy and seriousness link him to the races who acquired those qualities in the sombre forests of the Saxon Fatherland; his imagination and passion are weird, and tinged with something of the prophetic fervour of the Celt; his temper of mind is mystic; like the palmers and pilgrims of the day, he is a vagabond, a wanderer; and although like most of the common people, a Saxon, his speech is largely French in form; and here and there the lighter vein of the Romance breaks the otherwise too severe invective and sarcastic tone of the Vision; while the constant struggle visible in himself between the false and the true, between his higher and lower self, brings him as a living, thinking, suffering human being, into close fellowship with all who read his fragmentary story. J. S. PATTINSON.

OBITUARY.

MR. DAVID BOUCHER.

ON Friday, Aug. 11, Mr. David Boucher, of Moneyrea, co. Down, died at the age of seventy-seven. Mr. Boucher was a life-long member of the Moneyrea congregation, and a man of high character, keen intelligence, and fine humour. He was greatly respected and widely known amongst the farmers of the north of Ireland, with whom he had had business relations as a winnowing machine maker for upwards of half a century. The deceased gentleman was the elder brother of a former minister of St. Vincent-street, Glasgow, and Gravel Pit, Hackney—namely, the late Rev. John Boucher, and he was the father-in-law of the Rev. Harold Rylett, of London. He held advanced political views, and was an ardent admirer of Mr. Gladstone, but took no active part in political life.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Illingworth's "Divine Immanence."

"If ever on a bright night, while gazing at the stars in all their beauty, you have thought of the Creator of all things; if you have asked yourself who it is that has bespangled heaven with such flowers, and endowed all things with usefulness even greater than their beauty; if ever in the daytime you have studied the wonders of the light and raised yourself by things visible to the invisible Being, then you are a fit auditor (of Christian truth)." (Basil.) Gregory of Nyssa, Basil's brother and fellow-follower of Origen, has similar thoughts:—

"Look only," he says "at an ear of corn, at the budding of a plant, at a bunch of ripe grapes, at the beauty in fruit and flower of the early autumn; at the mountains, their bases green with grass which no human hand has sown, while their summits cleave the azure of the sky; at the springs that issue from their swelling slopes like fruitful breasts, to run in rivers through the glens; at the sea that receives all waters, yet remains within its bounds; its waves stayed by the shoreside, which they can never pass beyond. Look at these and suchlike sights, and can the eye of reason fail to read in them lessons of eternal truth?"

For "Matter had its origin in the uncreated loveliness, and throughout the whole range of matter there are echoes of spiritual beauty, through which we may be led to their immaterial archetypes." (Dionysius the Areopagite.)

Nor is it only the Greek Fathers who say things like this:—"Who can look on Nature," asks St. Hilary, "and not see God?"

"Every aspect and process of Nature," says Augustine, "proclaims its Creator with diverse moods and changes, like a variety of tongues."

And again, Gregory the Great:—"If we look attentively enough at outward, material things, we are recalled by them to inward, spiritual things. For the wonders of the visible creation are the footprints of our Creator; Himself as yet

* "Piers Plowman. A Contribution to the History of English Mysticism," by J. J. Jusserand. Translated from the French by M. E. R. London: Fisher Unwin. 1894. 12s.

we cannot see, but we are on the road that leads to vision, when we admire Him in the things that He has made. And so we call created things His footprints, since they are made by Him and guide us to Himself."

Such sentences might indeed be culled from almost every patristic writer, and are frequently echoed even in the austere pages of the schoolmen, while we gain glimpses of the same feeling on the dainty pages of illuminated books, in the choice of sites for monastic houses and hermits' homes of prayer, in the countless legends of tender sympathy between the animals and holy men. The Celtic saints in especial are full of the poetry of Nature, but perhaps its best expression is in the famous hymn of St. Francis of Assisi:—

"Praised be my Lord God with all His creatures, and specially our brother the sun, who brings us the day, and who brings us the light; fair is he and shines with a very great splendour: O Lord, he signifies to us Thee!"

"Praised be my Lord for our sister the moon, and for the stars, the which He has set clear and lovely in heaven.

"Praised be my Lord for our brother the wind, and for air and cloud, calms and all weather by the which Thou upholdest life in all creatures.

"Praised be my Lord for our sister water, who is very serviceable unto us, and humble and precious and clean.

"Praised be my Lord for our brother fire, through whom Thou givest us light in the darkness; and he is bright and pleasant and very mighty and strong.

"Praised be my Lord for our mother the earth, the which doth sustain us and keep us, and bringeth forth divers fruits and flowers of many colours, and grass."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

OUR mid-day halt is over, lunch disposed of, all the loose papers, &c., destroyed or hidden safely away, so as not to mar in any way the beautiful country that belongs to all of us; and now, refreshed, we take up our march again. Our path runs along under the base of mighty "Ill Bell," and very steep and frowning are his sides, now that we are close to him. If we tried, I think most of us could manage to scramble up, but we have not time for it to-day. Besides there is a better and easier way of reaching the summit, and in climbing hills we should use our heads as well as our heels. I know there is a great charm in going right at a great hill and tackling all the difficulties that come, but to-day, at any rate, we will temper our zeal with discretion. There are great streams of loose stones lying on the hill-side, which make it very difficult to go up, and still more difficult and dangerous to come down. Here and there these sheets or streams of stones are very large in size—huge fragments of rock, in fact—and they form an often secure refuge for a fox when hunted, and Master Reynard is quite clever enough to know this, and make good use of these "borrans."

Now, "Ramblers," "half-left turn," please, and let me see you capture the summit of this low grassy hill on our left. A steady ten minutes will do it, so tramp along: dodge those bright green boggy bits, and—"here we are." What a curious little hill, standing like an island in the midst of our valley. A great bird flaps away from a rocky ledge, a hawk evidently, though his flight just at present is not particularly hawk-like. It is much too big for a kestrel or sparrow hawk; ah, hear his cry—that, and his size, and the shape of his tail proclaim him to be a buzzard. I say "him," but probably "her" would be more correct, as Mrs. Hawk is larger than Mr. Hawk.

Now look, for with one grand swoop he or she sails across the valley, and sinks behind the crags, and out of our view.

Down and down we come, till at last we have only a couple of hundred feet to descend, and all of it nice short grass, no stones or rocks, just steep enough for a real jolly rush down. Join hands! Ready! Go! Some of us slip, but we are held up by others, and down the green slope comes the thin swaying line, running, leaping, skipping, sliding, shouting, and laughing, down comes our wave-crest of children, and breaks upon the grassy "shore." That was splendid. I think some of you would like to try it again, but others of us, bigger children who are shorter in breath than we used to be, beg to be excused.

Why! Is it possible? Is that you, dear little beck, murmuring gently and rather plaintively just before us? Why, what a tiny little beck you are! We can wade across you in many places almost dry shod!

Whatever is the matter? What do you say? "Had hardly any rain to feed you since the third week in May!" Why that is three months ago, so no wonder you feel "low," and your poor bones—which are stones in your case—show up so plainly and in such numbers. Never mind, old beck, I am pretty sure that soon the beautiful clouds will come and brood over the hills, and by-and-by wee rills of water will trickle by hundreds to your shrunken dry side, and a little later than that your bigger children will come running home to you, all white with haste. Then you, our little mother of water, will be strong and free again, and banks full from side to side; your beautiful brown water will rush through the shallows, leap the rapids and rocky falls in foaming glee; roll with smoothe unbroken swiftness over the weirs, and on, and on, till you find rest in beautiful Windermere.

As we walk by the bank side just now, how crystal clear the low waters are, so clear and low that the troutlets see us a long way, and dart off to a hiding place. Sometimes in their hurry little trout rush into places where they think they are not properly secure, and then, what a flurry and scurry to find hiding place number two. They splash and dash, and I have even seen them run themselves high and dry on a gravel shoal in their attempt to gain safety. But that is not often, for, as I think I have told you before, "Troutie" is a champion player at "hide and seek," and is very clever and quick at the game, so far as "hiding" is concerned, and I think he would be equally good at "seeking."

As we round a corner (please is that possible, children?) a great long-legged bird that has been standing quietly in a shallow pool rises slowly and awkwardly and then flaps himself off. That is a heron, and he has been up here for his dinner, standing quite still in the waters till an unwary fish sails within reach, then Mr. Heron's quick eye, sharp beak and long neck get to work, and there is one little fish less in our beck.

Now, children, over this wall with you, and remember that we have all "dry stone" walls up here—that is, there is no mortar or cement in them, so in climbing one you have to mind not to bring it, or any part of it, tumbling down with you. I speak feelingly on this point, and am inclined to halt and rub one of my shins tenderly in recollection.

We have left the stream and are now crashing our way as best we can through a dense wood, that grows on a hill side. The undergrowth is very thick, but we remark with satisfaction that most of it is made up of nut bushes, and following Captain Cuttle's advice, "we make a note of it."

It is quite true that there are also numerous brambles, with immensely long arms, studded with hooks, that lay hold of us as we brush away, and then, if we struggle furiously, tear our clothes and scratch our skin. No, no, Mr. "Wood Octopus," we will quietly and patiently rid us of your embrace. You may be friendly and mean well, but we would rather be excused.

How tall the bracken is in the few open glades we pass; it is quite an English jungle, and it is hot and heavy work, and it is so steep, and—but we are not grumbling you know—far from it, for are we not on a "ramble scramble" with a sure and certain way of turning these little troubles into a great piece of fun?

Besides, we are only ten minutes from home, and tea (lots of it) and bread and butter (heaps of it) is waiting for us, and certain hens have laid certain eggs destined for us, and Mrs. Overtheway has promised us fresh honey, and—(Next week, please. —ED.)

THE DELIGHT OF GROWING KNOWLEDGE.

THE Address to the students of Manchester College, Oxford, delivered at the close of the last session by the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A., as Visitor, of which we gave a full report at the time, has now been published under the title, "Study of Religion, Theology and Philosophy. What is its Worth?" The answer which Mr. HARGROVE gives to this question, if we have rightly understood the argument of his Address, is that for the individual, regarding his own personal interests alone, it is of little or no value, but that it has yet a great and abiding worth, because our life cannot be rightly regarded as that of isolated individuals, and in adding to the store of knowledge we are building for the future and thus rendering a true service to humanity.

Of this two-fold answer we find ourselves in complete accord with the second and positive conclusion, but not with the first; for if we have the power, and it is a good and noble thing, to labour for the building up of knowledge that is to be perfected in coming generations, it appears to us that there must be positive good also in that measure of knowledge which we have already attained, and that for our own individual life there is profit in such acquisition, and we ought to have joy in it none the less because we look forward to a more perfect measure of joy to come.

In an eloquent passage in the latter part of his address, in order to bring out the greatness of the ideal to which men are pledged in the patient acquisition of knowledge, Mr. HARGROVE drew an impressive picture of York Minster, with its ancient towers dwarf-ing all other buildings and making him who stood within its shadow realise his own insignificance. For centuries those glorious towers had stood, amid the storms as in the calm sunshine, unmoved, a monument of noble strength. And yet the mind of man had first conceived, and innumerable patient labourers had raised, that noble pile; each one had done his part, the humblest, as the wisest and most skilful, essential to the whole. "And then," Mr. HARGROVE adds,

I bethought me of that invisible temple which the Divine Architect, with infinite patience, is long a-building by labour of man—the temple whose foundations we have not yet dug out, for it shall stretch far and wide when once completed, and rise high to the heavens. It is the temple of Science, with upsoaring towers, and long-drawn aisles, and chapels of secret awe, and shrines of awful Presence of God made known to men. Temple, within and around whose unfinished walls we wander to-day, filled with joy and wonder, though at present we can only guess at the plan, and though so much be yet scarce imagined. Temple, in which men of the future shall walk in sweet communion, and pity our ignorance, and marvel at our follies, and experience that true knowledge and worship are all as one.

And to the building of this temple we are all called to help. Some few to great tasks, to set up a tower or to mark out some lines of new foundation, but all to labour according to their ability. For it were impossible to maintain intact that which is already known of men unless there were many to whom the treasure was committed. We advance as a mighty army, a very few go before, scouts and pioneers, but all follow. It is the great body which must take possession of what the few discover—knowledge is given to individuals only for the benefit of the race. And none of us learn solely to our own advantage.

Therefore all workers in the realms of knowledge must take courage. Known or unrecognised by the world, it is a noble service, in every part leading up to the highest, to the knowledge of God; for in theology is the crown of all science.

"In our day," Mr. HARGROVE had already said, "we have seen the realm of knowledge extending far and wide its bounds, and we have believed that Revelation was not sealed when a favoured age had closed, but is ever open to man, and depends in its depth and extent only on our ability to receive it, on our having ears to hear God's voice, and eyes to discern the open vision of His glory." Then why, we ask ourselves, that seeming surrender of the earlier part of the Address, for the individual, at any rate, on his own behalf, to the objection, "born anew of the weariness and doubt and disappointment of our age," that there is no sound theological knowledge in which satisfaction may be found.

Mr. HARGROVE quotes the dreary conclusion of JOHN STUART MILL, that even if all his noble aims in life were attained, he would have no joy in the end, and so could have no longer any interest in the means; and the check he himself received in the University Library at Cambridge in his enthusiastic and insatiable desire for knowledge; and he adds the instance of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, who left his great work, the Summa, or, "Whole of Theology," uncompleted, because as he drew towards the close of the work and of his life he was filled with a sense of the futility of all that he had accomplished. But to the faithful attendant who urged him to complete his life-work, THOMAS had replied:—"I cannot, for all the things which I have written seem to me now as mere chaff compared to that which I have seen and which God hath made known to me."

This does not appear to us a parallel to the former instances, but rather as a confession by the great theologian that at the conclusion of his unexampled labours there had come to him the dawning of fresh insight, a profounder knowledge of God, not stamping such labours in themselves as useless, but showing how the vision must grow from more to more, and the knowledge already gained may be at any moment superseded by a better. And so we would take that answer of the Shorter Catechism, which Mr. HARGROVE quotes, "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy Him for ever," not as marking a condition of life in which there can be no profit from acquired knowledge, but as pointing to an aim by no means necessarily inconsistent with that other aim of serving humanity, which is set before us as the real motive for the faithful acquisition of knowledge.

To glorify God in this present life we must surely seek with all humility to use every gift entrusted to us, and so to know more and more of the Divine will and the conditions of our life with God. And while we are perfectly aware of the limitations of our knowledge, and that at any moment what we have achieved may have to be forgotten in the revealing of diviner light, yet so long as we are true to the light so far granted us, we must rejoice in it, and thankfully look forward to being led yet further along the path of life. Looking back upon the past we see how the light has increased, and this gives confidence for the future; yet there is the present life with God in which we are already called to glorify Him, and in which we may have joy, which is also of God. "If to learn," said the voice in the University Library, "be the student's true happiness, and to know bring with it little of satisfaction; if the delight be all of discovery, and possession have no charm; then is not knowledge vanity and study waste of time better given to winning heaven, or certainly to enjoying earth?" Yes, If—then it may be so. But what kind of spirit is that which has no joy in knowledge, in tracing the lines of the Divine purpose in the world, in searching out the marvels of creation and all the mystery of beauty—and not merely in searching out, but in contemplating what is found, in tracing the progress of human history, in that communion with great souls which learning can give to those who are ready to receive it? There is delight in possession as well as discovery, because we are with God in the world, and growing knowledge does add to the treasures of the divine life we are allowed to share. It is quite true that knowledge without insight of love and faithfulness is barren, but there is no necessity for such a melancholy divorce, and while it is a noble aim to labour for the benefit of coming generations, it appears to us that for the completion of a true life there must be that enrichment of the individual life in the present, to which the growth of knowledge contributes no mean share.

THE WHITE CLOVER.

Amid the rich and cultured blooms that shined,
By friendly hands bound in a birthday gift,
I found the homely, dear white clover hid,
And thanked at heart the thought which placed it there—
The plain, good flower that cheerfully fulfils
Its homely duties in the common field,
Or by the road, ambitious of no more
Than to give needed food to kine and bees;
Yet serves God's higher love to human hearts,
When some poor, ragged, brown-cheeked boy or girl,
Crossing the field—the poor child's only garden—
Plucks it for nosegay or for ornament,
Or sucks a moment's pleasure from its cells;
Or when some one, not poor nor young, whose heart
Is yet a child, nor scornful of cheap joys,
Taking beyond the streets his morning walk,
Perceives a sudden fragrance in the air,
And, looking down, beholds the clover bloom,
And thanks the Lord who scatters common things
To make us learn to value common things,
To prize those things which we may share in common
With all, the humblest, more than things select.
He sows June fields with clover, and the world
Broadcasts with little common kindnesses,
With plain, good souls that cheerfully fulfil
Their homely duties in the common field
Of daily life, ambitious of no more
Than to supply the needs of friend or kin,
Yet serve God's higher will to human hearts,
Giving a very fragrance to the home,
The hidden sweetness of a kindly heart.

SAMUEL LONGFELLOW,

THOUGHTS FROM ITALY.

III.—GIOTTO.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.,
MINISTER OF ALL SOULS' CHURCH, BELFAST.

"He took him from the sheepfolds: From following the ewes great with young he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. So he fed them according to the integrity of his heart; and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands."
—Psalm lxxviii. 70–72.

IN previous sermons I have said that the influence of St. Francis and St. Dominic gave an extraordinary impulse to Florentine life in the thirteenth century, and produced, in the closing years of the century, the art of Arnolfo and Cimabue. The work of the first great builder and of the first great painter of Florence were equally and directly the outcome of the labours of the Friars. The religious revival deepened Florentine citizenship; then it raised noble churches; and then it covered the walls of the churches with paintings for the instruction of the people. This order of succession we must keep clearly before us if we would appreciate the peculiar spiritual beauty of Florentine art.

From Arnolfo and Cimabue I now pass to Giotto, and, because Giotto and the "divine poet" are inseparable, to his friend Dante.

Giotto and Dante must be thought of together. They were the two greatest Florentines of their age, men of supreme genius; and they should be studied in the light of each other. Giotto's frescoes and sculptures are the best commentary I know on Dante's poem; and to understand Giotto's art we cannot do better than read the "Divina Commedia." In speaking therefore of Giotto, I must say something of his great contemporary.

Giotto—shortened probably from "Angeliotto," or "Angelkin"—was a son of a peasant, Pietro Bondone, of Vespignano, a village about fourteen miles from Florence beyond Fiesole, in the wild and lonely hill-country of the Apennines. Cimabue found him there one day, keeping his father's sheep, and attempting to draw one of them on a rock; and he brought him, with his father's permission, to his workshop in the Glad Quarter, and made him a painter. That seems to have been in the year 1286, when Giotto was perhaps ten years old, and Dante a young Florentine scholar of one-and-twenty. I like to believe that Dante, who was a painter as well as a poet, received lessons from Cimabue, and met Giotto for the first time in Cimabue's house. At any rate his interest in him, however awakened, grew into admiration and affection. In 1298, when Dante had eclipsed rival poets with his "Vita Nuova," and gained prominence as a politician, Giotto had outstripped his old master, and received a commission from the Pope to paint in Rome. You know the story of his O. As his testimonial to the Pope he sent merely a circle finely drawn with a brush. Whence came the saying "Rounder than the O of Giotto." He appears to have been still in Rome in the year 1300. This was the year of Dante's priorship, or chief magistracy, in Florence, and the beginning of his troubles—and the poetic date of his immortal poem. Two years later Dante was in exile, and Cimabue was dead. Then Giotto, aged six-and-twenty, succeeded to his master's house and place, and was appointed to decorate the chapel of the Podestà. On the end-wall, among those fit to be in Paradise, the young painter boldly introduced the portrait of his banished friend. Like our Edmund Spenser, Giotto, in his early work, did honour to a friend who was out of favour. Let us remember this. Fearlessness for beauty and right is an essential element in artistic genius. No great poet or painter was ever yet timid. He is bold and daring, ready to risk all, touched with a sense of the Infinite.

Not long ago this portrait was discovered under the whitewash in the Bargello, and irreparably injured by bad restoration.* Happily, however, it was secretly traced in its original state; and, as such, it gives us the poet at about the age of thirty-five—

"In the midway of this our mortal life"

—the central figure in a group of men of letters. He holds a book, probably the "Vita Nuova," under his left arm; and in his right hand he has what I take to be a sprig of pomegranate, with fruit and leaves.† The face is strong and calm, and extraordinarily youthful, as yet unmarred by the world's rough usage. Dante had only just begun to experience the bitterness and agony of his life. As you are aware, he never returned to Florence. Political hatred and his own stern pride kept him away. But Giotto, who went on many journeys to execute his commissions, met him at Padua, Ravenna, and elsewhere.

They were together at Padua in 1306, where Giotto decorated the chapel of the Arena with scenes from the lives of the Virgin and Jesus. The chapel is still there—a small building in the early Italian Gothic—and its frescoes are of limitless interest to students of Dante. In one of them Jesus sits in Judgment, with Heaven on his right and Hell on his left. It differs in certain respects from Dante's conception, but the resemblance in others is so marked, that we may believe it was painted with the poet looking on, and perhaps making suggestions, at the very time when he was busy on his own "Inferno." Satan, for example, is represented as a huge, hairy savage sitting in the pit of Hell, with a victim in each hand, and a third disappearing through his crunching jaws.‡ Beneath these frescoes, also, are allegorical figures, in monochrome, of the Virtues and Vices, which are full of the spiritual insight of the "Divine Comedy." I especially noted two—Charity and Injustice. Charity is a woman, with roses in her hair, holding in her right hand a bowl of flowers and fruit, and with her left receiving a heart from Jesus above. Underneath her are bags of gold, the precious metal dug from the earth to serve man, but in itself of the earth, earthy, to be trodden under foot. Injustice is a male figure, a cruel tyrant, seated in front of his strong fortress in a wood. He clasps a long hook in his talons* to catch the innocent, and a sword to slay them. In the wood a merchant is robbed and his wife outraged, while armed warriors stand by with heads of beasts. It is tremendously true. Industry and womanhood are still the chief victims of our social injustice; while the powerful, those most able to defend them, look on and are brutalised. And notice one other dramatic touch. Injustice is a coward. Not only does he dwell in darkness, but, like Tito, he wears under his robe a mail-shirt.

But the place where one delights most of all to think of Giotto and Dante together is Assisi. When Giotto was at Assisi, finishing Cimabue's work, and putting his whole soul into his allegorical picture of St. Francis in the roof above the saint's grave, Dante, it is said, was with him, and helped him in the design. It is extremely probable. Dante loved St. Francis and Assisi, and his eleventh canto of the "Paradiso" is as beautiful in their praise as Giotto's painting. Moreover, as I have said, in this painting Giotto has brought in Dante, no longer youthful, with very marked signs of suffering, and a second figure, which may be himself, climbing the steep hill of Purity.

Let me say a word or two of this great picture. It fills the four compartments of the groined roof. In one, St. Francis marries Poverty; in a second he takes the vow of Chastity, and in a third the vow of Obedience; in a fourth he is glorified. Everywhere are points of interest. Chastity, secure in a tower which strongly resembles Arnolfo's on the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence and shows us Giotto's taste as an architect at this period, is encouraged by angels who bring her gifts. St. Francis, yoked, is guided by reins which are held by hands in Heaven. Beneath him, in a cloister, are allegorical figures of Prudence, Obedience and Lowliness, very similar to but more delicately worked out than those at Padua. In his beatitude the saint sits under a canopy supported by spiral shafts (which Giotto afterwards used with fine effect in his Bell Tower), and is surrounded by thronging angels, singing and playing on instruments, and linked together by their fingers. The figure of Poverty, however, is that on which the artist has concentrated his full strength.

Giotto, indeed, was no ascetic. He was a happy, married man with six children, thrifty and prosperous—a little fellow with a plain face and a merry heart, and a way of seeming less earnest than he was. An amusing poem of his is extant—for he was a poet as Dante was a painter—in which he makes fun of Dame Poverty, and confesses that he prefers Dame Plenty. But his religious nature, always underlying his humour,† felt the grand meaning of St. Francis' vow, and he painted it as no one else could have done. Poverty stands barefoot and cold on the hard rock, her feet among thorns, clad, like Griselda,* in her smock, torn but industriously patched, and tied with the knotted cord of the Franciscans. Below, a boy pushes the thorns against her with a stick, another boy throws stones, and a dog barks at her: types of the petty persecutions which beset the unfortunate. But above her head the thorns put forth roses, and resurrection lilies spring out of the rock. Angel wings are on her shoulders; and Jesus is by her side. It is a noble conception, worthy of Dante.

Dante's aim as a poet was, of course, confessedly religious. The subject of the "Divine Comedy" was, in his own words, "Man, as rendering himself liable by good or ill-desert, in the exercise of his free-will, to the rewards or punishments of justice"; and its purpose was "to make those who live in this life leave their state of misery and lead them to a state of blessedness." Giotto's motive was similar. He painted to delight and teach the people, to portray on the church-walls what the preacher described in the pulpit to everyday men and women. And, as a painter, his influence was then wider than Dante's. Dante wrote in his native tongue, instead of in Latin, in order to speak to as many as possible; but Giotto spoke to those who could not read as well as those who could—to peasants, and women, and children, as well as scholars and nobles. Like Shakespeare, and I would add with something of Shakespeare's universality of sympathy, Giotto appealed to the most universal of the senses, the eye. He furnished a great show, not confined, as Cimabue's had been, to madonnas and saints, but embracing all sorts and conditions of men—traders, lawyers, soldiers, priests, monks, friars, labourers, beggars, popes, kings, queens, barons, lepers, schoolboys—a world almost as large and varied as that of the "Canterbury Tales,"† grouped about the Church and its Saints, as an essential part of Christendom. One element in particular is conspicuous—wherein again he resembles Shakespeare. Whenever he can he brings in something of the life of his boyhood. The shepherds and the sheep, the dogs, the oxen and asses, and birds, and wild beasts, the vines and fig-trees and grasses, and rocky hill-sides of the country beyond Fiesole, are his constant delight, and the unfailing accessories of his religious pictures. It is very wonderful and beautiful. Giotto never forgot that he was taken from the sheepfolds, to feed his people according to the integrity of his heart, and guide them by the skilfulness of his hands.

The secret, perhaps, of this universality and tenderness was the open, joyous heart of the great painter. Cimabue had taught him not to copy him, but to study the works and ways of the Creator, and to reproduce something of their infinity. The master himself had dared to strike out into the unknown, believing that God would lead him to something good. But the pupil went far beyond anything the master had dreamed. Cimabue's daring seems to tremble beside Giotto's. He threw away all the Byzantine formalities. He would paint the Madonna as a real living woman like his own wife, and the Child as a real living child like one of his own babies, and he would glorify them by the beauty of their expression. The Byzantines had rules that the sky should be golden, woman's flesh white, man's red, trees black, and so forth; but Giotto declared that the sky was blue, that human cheeks and lips were rosy, and leaves green. "Let us paint things," he said, in effect, "as God makes them. Have done with this false glitter. Let there be light. Let the sun shine on the Virgin and Jesus, on Palestine, on Assisi, and St. Francis, and Florence, and on all of us." So sunny, in fact, was Giotto's nature that at first he saw little beauty in shadow, and his paintings are almost without it. But we cannot have everything at once. We must rejoice that he saw the sun in the heavens and felt its blessed influence on the earth, and loved the bright days, and the bright colours of the fields and of happy human faces. Furthermore, Giotto had faith, and beheld the light of God in man's suffering and sadness. Scenes of humiliation and torture and grief, which he depicts with infinite concern and expression, he relieves by bringing in the glad forms of the other world, angels robed in light and with radiant countenances, singing their songs of triumph, and flooding the world of pain with the joy of immortality.

I would like to illustrate these characters of Giotto's painting; but I must now speak of his famous "Bell-Tower," which is justly regarded as the finest product of his genius.

Giotto, as I have said, was an architect and sculptor as well as a painter—a combination of the arts which was not uncommon in the mediæval workmen. We may see that he was an architect in his frescoes, and that he was a painter in his Campanile and its sculptures. But he seems to have devoted himself chiefly to painting until he was elected, towards the end of his life, to finish Arnolfo's cathedral and add a bell-tower. Then, in his maturity, he surpassed all previous efforts and designed for his fellow-citizens one of the most perfect buildings in the world.

It was begun in 1334, two years and a-half before his death, which was, perhaps, hastened by the labours of it. It was finished just fifty years after his decease, in 1387.

Let me very briefly describe it.

It stands a few yards from the cathedral—as ancient bell-towers usually do—on its own base, fifty feet square, and rises straight from the ground three hundred feet without buttresses. It is of stone, adorned on its four sides with a dress of rose-coloured marble, delicately striped with black and green: a sort of rich mosaic which glows and flashes in the blue sky. Every change in the heavens is reflected on this brilliant surface. Its length is divided into stages, which are finely proportioned and varied. The ground stage is square and massive, to bear the weight above. The next is oblong, and

* The iron of the hook resembles and emphasises the hard talon.

† Giotto had no lack of humour. In the scene of the Marriage Feast at Cana, for example, he introduces a portly wine-taster, whose scepticism about the new liquor is changed to a very human appreciation. He was also the cause of considerable humour in other men. His portrait of himself, in one of the frescoes at Padua, confirms his reputation for plainness. He was the butt of some of his comrades. One day, in front of his house (Cimabue's old house) in the Via del Cocómoro, he was thrown down by a runaway pig. Yet he was equal to the situation. "The brute is right," he said; "many a hundred florins I have earned by his bristles, but I have never given him even a bowl of broth."

* "And in her smock, with head and foot all bare, Toward her father's house forth is she fare."

—Clerk's Tale, 895f.

It is a pleasant thought that Chaucer, when at Padua in 1373, saw Giotto's frescoes in the Arena Chapel, fresh and beautiful. It was the boast of Petrarch, whom Chaucer met at Padua in that year, that he had known Giotto and possessed one of his pictures.

† Giotto's art is nearly as illuminating to the study of Chaucer as of Dante, and in some ways Giotto was far more akin to the English than to the Italian poet. Dante's humour, for instance, is sternly grotesque; that of Giotto and Chaucer is kindly.

lightened by vertical bands and recesses. The third and fourth are still further lightened, being pierced by pairs of windows with tall spiral shafts. Then, tallest and lightest of all, comes the fifth stage, broken on each face with a single magnificent window with double spiral rods. Finally, the whole is capped by a strong richly-ornamented, projecting parapet. Thus, as you look at the tower, your eye is drawn up from stage to stage, never distracted nor held too long at any point, but continually delighted, and led up, until it rests at last in the jewelled crown.

But I fancy some one may say rather impatiently, "What has this to do with religion? How can a tower help us to love God or man?"

Well, a great teacher said that there were "sermons in stones," and I believe we may find many a sermon in this lovely stone of Giotto. I think it has been preaching to the citizens of Florence for more than five hundred years. Does not every building tell us something, good, bad, or indifferent, of the man who erected it? You may see whether he loved truth or falsehood; whether he cared for show or genuineness; whether he was selfish and sought only a large and swift pecuniary profit, or delighted to possess a good and beautiful thing which should outlast his time and give joy to others. For example, there are houses which show no trace of love in their construction, poor, starved-looking edifices which gave no pleasure to those who built them, masters or men, and will give none to those who are unfortunate enough to live in them: loveless, Christless places, which encumber and darken God's earth and hide Him from our eyes. So, too, there are shops, warehouses, and even churches, made for display, to look well on the street, with imposing fronts but everything cheap and nasty in the sides and rear: false, shallow buildings which are the mark of untruth in all who admire them. I might speak of many such deceptions. We see gables with no roofs to them, pillars and buttresses supporting no weight, arches with nothing to do, and sometimes with their centres cut out and utterly imbecile. We see stucco partitioned to look like stone, plaster painted to look like marble, deal grained to look like oak, cast iron coloured to pass for bronze, and paper glazed to resemble leaded glass. One and all, these things are feeble lies, and proofs, in their degree, of degeneracy of taste, proofs absolute that the spirit of Beauty is going from us.

You will find nothing of this kind in Giotto's Tower. For more than five centuries it has protested against them. For five hundred years, and more, it has stood in the midst of a great commercial community and denounced its shams and trash. For all those years it has preached, even when the living mouth of the Church has been silent, lessons of sacrifice, honesty, thoroughness, the power and dignity of labour, beauty, freedom, restraint, and reverence.

If you look at it carefully you will see that its cost was very great. It was met, we are told, by a tax cheerfully borne by the citizens. The men who did this splendid work were not content to live in luxurious dwellings and to offer to God bare and mean and stingy walls. And you will see, too, that it witnesses in every part of it to happy, as well as hard work.

The builders were glad to do it, and were the better for doing it. It called forth the best powers Giotto and his pupils had, and those powers were exerted with joy. Then there is no falsehood in it. It reveals immediately the great secrets of its structure. We know what it is made of, and find that it is all good. It is an open, frank-faced, genuine thing, a piece of enchantment without trickery and consequently without disappointment.

For it is beautiful. It has all the elements of noble and rare beauty. It is massive, giving the sense of power, a serious majestic piece of work, fit to be a part of a cathedral and to call the inhabitants of a great city to their prayers. Yet it is without gloom or severity. It springs out of the earth like a pine-tree, and is rich with glowing colours and delicate tracery and mingled lights and shadows—for Giotto had now learnt the beauty of shade. It is consistent throughout, every square foot being in keeping with every other; and it is symmetrical; yet the whole is alive with a subtle spirit of variation and freedom. And, finally, the more it is known the more it discloses. A spectator on the ground, with good eyesight, may study all its details. It is proportioned to that end. At the base, near the eye, are delicately cut bas-reliefs. Higher they would be invisible; lower they would be liable to injury. Above them are larger carvings, of simpler design. Above these are statues, fewer and, again, larger. Next, much larger than the statues, come the windows. And last, largest of all, a mass of bold ornament, comes the single window, an exquisite piece of fairy work when seen from below. But years of study would not exhaust all that Giotto thus puts before us. The marbles and windows, with their dark apertures, of the upper stories have something new to tell every day, almost every hour, and in moonlight they have a different loveliness. No Florentine, with a soul in him, would ever be weary of their beauty. And below, in the sculpture, is infinite food for reflection. The statues include patriarchs, prophets, and sybils; the carvings beneath them represent the Cardinal and Theological Virtues, Works of Mercy, the Beatitudes and the Sacraments; and nearest the eye is a series of twenty-eight bas-reliefs giving the poetic history of human progress from the first consciousness in man of his Maker and of himself as God's child with a work to do, to his sense of his immortality with eternal life before him in Heaven.

Let me dwell for just a minute or two on this lowest series.

In the first sculpture man lies on the clod, looking up into his Maker's face, as if awakened from a dull and heavy sleep. This is the starting-point of all good. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom and knowledge and power and civilisation. Then in subsequent pictures we see man rise up and stand and battle with the elements about him. He hoes the ground, dwells in a tent and keeps sheep, invents string and wind instruments, works in metals, and cultivates the vine. Settled home-life follows, with study of the stars, and a feeling after something beyond them, building to protect wealth, the making of pottery, riding, weaving, and legislation. Next, there is communication among peoples by conquest of the air (still a prophecy), the sea, and the hidden forces of the earth. This last is a grand panel, representing man in the form of Hercules striding the earth like a god, with Antaeus, the savage spirit of the ground, under his foot. At length, when the ox is trained for ploughing, and the horse for driving, man may stay in his house and learn geometry, carving, painting, literature, arithmetic, logic, singing, and, the crown of all, in its mediæval sense, music. In this concluding sculpture, which is worthy to close the story, we see man aged, with long grey hair, and with experience, and suffering, and conquest in his face, looking up and listening, while he strikes with his hammer on an anvil. So out of the hard seeming dead metal of the world he at last strikes the music which is from on high, and calls him to realms which no eye hath seen nor ear heard.

Finally, over the door of the Tower, the door which everyone must enter who would mount its winding steps, is the figure of a lamb. Giotto had loved the lambs in his father's fields. In his old age he knew the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world, and which said "I am the Door; by me if any man enter in he shall be saved."

Thus the great artist spoke to men and women and children who came to the strait-gate of the Cathedral Tower, and still speaks to the generations which rise and pass away, of the Love and Sacrifice by which alone we can be good citizens, and build noble cities, and ascend to the Heavenly City not made with hands.

THE GROWTH OF CHURCH ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND.—II.

THE Norman conquest was not the conquest of a barbarous country by a civilised Power. English civilisation had reached a high degree in the reign of Alfred two centuries before, and in architecture, as in other arts, aided of course by builders and artists from the Continent, the work they did was devoid neither of careful construction nor of ornament.

But the Norman conquest introduced a new and vigorous power, and after the first great struggle, peace and order; and when the two races had amalgamated there followed a national independence which has never since been violated.

The Normans introduced a new controlling power, and they organised and developed the resources of the country, and they built fortresses and churches. Before the end of the eleventh century they had built the massive square Tower of London, and a similar one at Malling in Kent, and there are remains still of some fifteen to twenty other Norman keeps, as they are called, which were founded in the eleventh and completed in the twelfth century, at Hedingham (Essex), Norwich, Castle Rising (Norfolk), Appleby, Carlisle, Richmond (Yorkshire), Guildford, and other places. Most of these, as Guildford, Rochester, Castle Hedingham, and Richmond, are now in ruins, but others, like the towers of London and Newcastle, are in a complete state of preservation and actual use.

The Normans began almost immediately to rebuild the churches of their newly-acquired country. In most cases, doubtless, there was a chapel in the keep of the Castle itself. The chapel in the Tower of London is the most perfect and earliest example of a pure Norman chapel in England. It is a plain, massive oblong building, with nave and side aisles. It forms one of the upper stories of the tower itself, and the aisles are on the thickness of the walls of the tower below. The east-end is apsidal (or round), and the roof of the nave is a plain barrel vault without ribs or groining. The pillars are short and massive, the capitals mostly quite plain. On some of them there is a little carving of simple character, but it is possible this may have been executed at a somewhat later date.

The earliest Norman churches were of a very rough, plain, and simple construction. The piers in many cases (as at St. Albans), and in the old church at Elstow, the piers of Norwich, and the alternate larger piers of Durham are square, sometimes quite plain and without any columns against them as in the original portions of St. Albans, and at Elstow, sometimes with columns at the corners or on the face, as in Norwich and Durham.

The earlier Norman arches are all semicircular. The semicircular arch is the simplest of all to construct, and naturally came first. The only forms known in Roman architecture appear to have been some segment of a circle or of an ellipse. There is no pointed arch known of earlier date than the twelfth century.

In the earliest Norman buildings the arches were not only thus simple in form, but also perfectly plain in construction. In Elstow Church, Winchester Cathedral, and some other buildings the arch is perfectly plain, without recess or moulding or ornament of any description. Evidently they are built solely for the practical purpose of supporting the upper part of the building, and with no thought of beauty. But ornament soon appears. The simplest form is the cutting of diagonal moulded lines, at an angle on the side face of each stone of the arch. Then when the stones are placed end to end this succession of diagonal lines at an angle forms a zigzag moulding along the whole line of the arch. Similarly, a succession of stones, each with two diagonal moulded lines, will form a series of lozenge shapes. This zigzag, lozenge, and a variety of other simple but effective mouldings are characteristic of Norman architecture. They are extremely effective, but they entirely disappear before the more elaborate and delicate carving of a later date. The massive plain stone capitals, again, that appear on the plain round piers, such as those in the Tower, seem to tempt the carver, and before long they are worked out into a succession of little cushion-like shapes (as at Hereford and elsewhere) in place of the great solid cushions of the Tower. In other places, as at St. Peter's, Northampton (one of the most beautiful and interesting Norman churches in England), they are covered with a mass of elaborate carving of rude foliage and figures.

The Norman work was rough in construction, wide jointed, and, to a great extent, filled in with rubble; but it was massive, there was room on it for plenty of ornament, carved capitals, and on the columns themselves elaborate and ornate mouldings, and deep fluting, either perpendicular or spiral, or in double spirals forming a complete covering of a diamond shaped pattern over the whole column, as in the magnificent columns of Durham, and at Waltham in Essex.

About the middle of the twelfth century a change took place, which was to open the way for a development of Gothic architecture, almost unparalleled in any other art. This was the introduction of the pointed arch. It appears first in the round Templar churches—as, for example in the Temple Church, London—in which we find the earliest pointed arches of which the date is known in this country; and in the Temple Church of St. Sepulchre, in Northampton, which is probably still earlier, but of which the date is not exactly known. The pointed arch was not an arbitrary invention; it arose naturally out of structural convenience when, as in the cases just mentioned, the church was circular in form; or where, as at Fountains Abbey, the space between the columns of the nave was less than the width of the aisle, so that it was necessary to carry a narrow arch to the same height as the wider one, which, of course, was impossible if both were semicircular. In a semicircular arch width and height must be the same.

Until the end of the twelfth century this introduction of pointed arches affected the general style of architecture but little. At the end of the twelfth century the loftier, lighter arch thus produced and a corresponding tendency to greater lightness of construction throughout brought about the change from Norman to Early English style.

E. H. JONES.

UNDER THE RED EAGLE.—V.

Few things can testify so strongly to the artificiality of European boundary lines as a journey from Bozen to Trent. At Trent we are, we feel sure, in Italy. In the streets the pleasant Italian tongue resounds on all sides; the houses are Italian. Cross the Via Lunga and take the Via Larga, and you find yourself in a few minutes in a most thoroughly Italian Piazza; there are painted houses on one side of you, and the cathedral in front is a Romanesque basilica with

"Porch-pillars on the lion resting,
And sombre, old, colonnaded aisles," just as in the Lombard churches. It has been defaced by restoration, but yet keeps some of the old beauty. Yet you are still under the shadow of the Red Eagle. There is a little river coming down to the Adige from the Val di Non, and on either side of its banks is a village—the northern one is Deutschmetz or Mezzotedesco, the southern Welschmetz or Mezzolombardo, and between those two the real Italian boundary lies. Whether it will ever be recognised is one of those things that lie "on the knees of the gods." Soon after the Boznars set up their statue of the German Walther, the Trentiners erected a fine statue of Dante with an inscription claiming him as a compatriot. There seems little doubt that Dante was familiar with Trent and the country round. He refers to the wild waste of broken rock near by, and to the lake of Garda. From Trent to that lake the journey is short and easy. We leave the main line at Mori and commit ourselves to a little train that climbs by-and-by like a wild goat among the masses of tumbled rock that hang over the little green lake of Loppio. Beyond Nago we look down upon a sudden grand view of the lake in its entire length; we can just make out in the dim distance a shadowy promontory which is "Sweet Catullus' all-but-island, olive, silvery Sirmio." Then the train turns and accommodates itself sociably to the main road, which it follows all the way to Arco and Riva. Going down to Arco we turn our backs on the lake, and at Arco are some four or five miles distant from it. A flat plain—once, no doubt, a part of the lake—is broken by the island-like Mont Brione, but there is a glimpse to the right of this of the "shining levels." Arco is a health-resort for the winter months, visited almost entirely by Germans. I have a sad suspicion that the average German recognises natural beauty more quickly and loves it better than the average Englishman. At any rate he has less love of spoiling it. I think, when I see Arco—still picturesque—with its precipitous limestone crags contrasting with its southern luxuriance of growth—with its old town and old castle not out of harmony with its public walks, and not improved away by speculators—I think of Lucerne, and sigh! The castle is but a ruin now on its tremendous rock, that on one side dips down, a sheer precipice, to the Sarca, which here leaves its ravine and meanders through vineyards to the lake. When the Sarca leaves the lake it takes the stately name of Mincio; but that is beyond the ken of our eagle, which only shadows a few miles of the lake. The castle rock on the side towards the town slopes just enough to allow of olive terraces and a small army of sentinel cypresses. If ever two trees were made to grow together, surely they were. The sharp outline and dark inflexibility of the cypress sets off "the lightsome olive's twinkling canopy." When, in the spring, the young mulberry trees wear their first green, that is the final touch of colour that perfects the picture. The influx of German visitors has mitigated the outward show of the Italian sentiment that prevails all over the Trentino—you get that more plainly on the shore of the lake. At Torbole, a little village three miles from Riva, I once saw a poor cripple with a hurdy-gurdy being hissed and hustled; and when I perceived that his poor instrument was performing the Austrian National Anthem, I understood quite well. It is only just to say that the approach of strangers scattered the tiny mob. Riva, with its harbour, is hidden away in a corner of the lake, under a mighty wall of cliff that shelters it from the afternoon sun. The "aura," the delicious breeze that springs up nearly every day, tempers the heat, so that when Arco is deserted Riva keeps its visitors. From the little terrace of the Sole d'Oro with its clipped tunnels of euonymous and oleander there is a limited view of the lake; a great limestone shoulder shuts in the little bay. On the other side Monte Baldo lifts its bare sides without a visible track to mitigate its wildness.

There is snow on the summit, and this spring there was an awe-inspiring rumour of hot springs and volcanic action indignantly denied at Riva, but used as "copy" by English and German papers. The harbour at Riva is quietly busy. The little steamers steal in and out, and the barges bring timber, which is thrown out on to the quay with a dull monotonous thud, which on a hot sleepy day can be soothing in its regularity. The clock-tower has mounted a dial with the Italian twenty-four hours, which looks strangely modern on its ancient stones. There is a row of chestnuts curving away beyond the little custom-house, where the arms of Italy and Austria are in friendly juxtaposition. At night the search-lights of the Italian revenue boats skim over the lake. There is a good deal of smuggling done here. Once I walked along the marvellous Ponale road that is blasted in the cliff and recalls the circles of the Purgatory. I turned inland with the road up the Ledro valley, always abounding in flowers when I have seen it, and went to a little inn at Biacesa for some refreshment. Mine host had a slight suggestion of the brigand about him, and was very steadfast in his refusal to speak a word of German. He called my attention to a gun in the corner of the room, and assured me it was used for hunting. I had not suspected him before, but then I felt certain that that gun was accustomed to smuggling expeditions on dark nights. However, he was civil enough, and there were no adventures. The Ponale road is a marvel. The limestone crags above are hung with yellow cytisus and other rock plants. Even fig-trees cling here and there. Below the lake curves in and out, in "bays the peacock's neck in hue." Opposite is Monte Baldo's long range. The scenes come back, however, to the "inward eye" in fainter colours than reality, and "when I think thereon I wish myself among them."

A VISIT TO IRISH CONGREGATIONS CONNECTED WITH THE ENGLISH SUSTENTATION FUND.

SOME years ago, in conjunction with Mr. David Martineau, I visited the Welsh congregations aided by the Sustentation Fund, and THE INQUIRER was good enough to print the report which we made as to the result of our inquiries. A long-desired opportunity for making a similar pilgrimage to the congregations in the north of Ireland which receive grants from the same fund presented itself in July of the present year, and, by your permission, I am glad to give some report as to the information I obtained.

Our chapels in Ireland are under conditions varying in many ways from those of England. The depopulation of Ireland has had a serious influence on the numbers and wealth of these congregations; and it is almost surprising that the effect has not been more severe. Also, just as in England, the drift from the country to the towns has diminished the attendance at the country chapels; while I could not ascertain that the town congregations have benefited correspondingly, for many immigrants form new religious connections, or, in some cases, become comparatively indifferent to religious observances.

The great distances over which each congregation is scattered render it, in many cases, almost impossible, where the chapel stands isolated amid farms, to hold more than one service on each Sunday; although in Belfast evening services are held in some chapels for at least part of the year. The Communion service is maintained in the old Presbyterian fashion, being celebrated once in six months, and largely attended. The Sunday-schools are almost confined to the children of the congregation. In country districts almost every family is connected with a place of worship, so that all the children have religious teaching. But this limitation prevails also in the city of Belfast, where I could not ascertain that the same effort is made as in England to secure the attendance at the Sunday-school of children whose parents are not connected with religious institutions; and on Sunday morning I saw many barefooted boys running about hawking newspapers for sale.

If the Sunday duties of the minister in the country chapels are light, as compared with those of an English minister, the calls upon his time for pastoral work are heavier. The large area over which his flock is scattered makes the expected visits a considerable labour even by the help of a bicycle. When a death occurs much longer and more frequent attendance is expected than by a mourning English family. Again, the Presbyterian custom of holding a short religious service at an ordinary pastoral visit is still maintained. The route of the week's visits is sometimes announced from the pulpit on the Sunday, so that the neighbours may assemble at the appointed central home.

I was struck with the fact that the congregations seem able to make great occasional efforts to raise money. A bazaar held at Templepatrick just before my visit cleared nearly £600. About £200 had recently been raised to pay the cost of building a schoolroom at Killinchy. At Mountpottinger in Belfast, £400 was raised not long ago by a bazaar towards an outlay of £550 in adding transepts to the meeting-house; and a goodly list of such efforts to repair and enlarge chapels, build manse or schoolrooms could readily be made out by a resident. But I was strongly impressed with the feeling that there is not an equal disposition to make regular annual payments of a sufficient amount for the support of the minister. Indeed, if a minister shows especial attention to some distant and neglectful member of his congregation, he may be rewarded by the genial and generous promise, "I'll come and give you a hearing some day before long." This deficiency of regular contributions is, perhaps, in some measure owing to the fact that many of these congregations had formerly grants from the Regium Donum. These grants were commuted at the time when the Irish Church was disestablished. The commutation fund was applied in various ways; sometimes for the permanent benefit of the congregation; sometimes it was appropriated by the minister, while in other cases a compromise was effected so that both minister and congregation were benefited. Nearly a dozen of the congregations joined these grants together, and increased the fund by their own contributions; so that an annual grant of about £60 is now made to the congregations associated in the Irish Sustentation Fund. But several of the congregations were unable to join in this arrangement, and some new ones have been formed which are not entitled to the grant. These congregations have sought, and several of them have received, the aid of the English Sustentation Fund; and if the wealthy members of our congregations in the North of Ireland would make a substantial contribution to that fund, it would be able to make more liberal grants to these needy congregations than it is now justified in doing.

My first visit was paid to Killinchy on July 15. Passing through Comber, whose minister, the Rev. J. Dunkerley, was from home, I arrived, after a five miles' journey by an Irish car, at the manse, occupied by the Rev. J. Geary and his housekeeper. It is a good and roomy house, though, as the road is raised to cross a neighbouring brook, you enter the house on the level of the first floor, while at the back the basement opens on the ground level. About twenty years ago four acres of land surrounding the meeting-house, as places of worship are called in Ireland, with a police-barracks on the ground, were bought for £365. In 1890 the police building was pulled down and the manse erected in its place, the expense being £450. A sexton's house had been previously built at a cost of £30, and in 1897 a convenient and roomy hall or schoolroom was built behind the manse for £235, the money being raised by a recent bazaar.

There is a large chapel in good condition internally, capable of holding 800 people. It was filled to overflowing when Mrs. Ormiston Chant preached there some time ago, and the sum of £50 was collected which will shortly be applied for external repairs and decoration. The congregation is scattered, some members living at a distance of ten miles; but there is a good attendance, with occasional evening services. I attended service on the morning of Sunday, July 16, when I counted 15 boys and 20 girls present in the Sunday-school. This was smaller than the regular number, while the congregation of 150 was said to be rather larger than usual, owing to the presence of some visitors. On special occasions the attendance increases to 500, 600, or even 800. The Committee met me in the vestry shortly before the service, and I had some conversation with them with regard to the Sustentation Fund, on behalf of which they promised to hold a collection in November. An afternoon Sunday-school and occasional evening services are held in the summer months at the neighbouring village of Ballydorn.

I was not able to spend a Sunday at Crumlin, but the Rev. James Hall, who hospitably entertained me for the night, arranged a tea-party of members of his congregation to give me the meeting on July 24. A substantial chapel, capable of holding 900, is situated in an extensive graveyard, in which are also built a good schoolroom and some cottages, one of which is occupied by the schoolteacher. A well-built roomy manse, with about two acres of land, is situate half-a-mile away, and tenanted by the minister. The congregation is scattered over an area extending to three or four miles distance, and consequently the attendance is affected, and the young people of the congregation, who form the Sunday-school, are not numerous. I had evidence of the respect in which Mr. Hall is held, and the congregation seemed substantial and staunch.

My next visit was to the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Meeting-house at Moirra. Though not a large building, it is 200 years old, being the oldest place of worship in the district. About seventy years ago a secession took place. The large graveyard was divided, and on the half surrendered by the mother congregation a Presbyterian chapel was built by the seceders, who accepted the Westminster Confession of Faith. The Episcopal church has a large congregation, although the population of the town does not exceed 300. When the Irish Church was disestablished, the minister of our meeting-house at Moira took the full benefit of the Commutation Grant, and all aid from this source has been lost. The congregation was additionally unfortunate. After paying more than £100 to the Irish Sustentation Fund they dropped their contributions to it about thirty years ago, and have vainly endeavoured, by offering to pay up arrears with interest, to resume their connection with that fund, but were unable to raise the sum of £1,500 required in order to qualify them as recipients of an annual grant. I met Mr. Agnew and three or four sturdy and intelligent members of the congregation. Some of them come four miles every Sunday, and, although they live nearer to the chapel at Dromore, they are staunch to their family connection with Moira, especially as their secession might lead to the closing of the meeting-house. Their earnestness was shown by the expenditure two years ago of about £65 in re-roofing the building. The Rev. A. E. O'Connor, B.D., having moved to Torquay, the Rev. William Weatherall, their former minister, has returned to his charge — a small but vigorous flock. Compared with the size of the congregation, the attendance at the Sunday-school is good.

A longer journey by rail took me to Warrenpoint where the Rev. S. C. Pinkerton met me, and I accompanied him to the beautiful spot of Rostrevor, on the Carlingford Bay, and next morning to the house at Killowen, from which Lord Russell takes his title. We then proceeded together to Newry, where Mr. Pinterton's stone-built chapel fills an excellent position in the centre of the town. It is a handsome building, but having no galleries, will not hold more than 300 or 400. Behind it is a capacious school-room, and a substantial sexton's house. The premises stand on a large corner plot, of which part has been let off on rental. A well-managed Sunday-school is held here, with seventy scholars on their books, and an average attendance of forty-five. The usual attendance at the morning service is about 80, while half that number attend the winter evening services, which the state of Mr. Pinkerton's health has recently obliged him to omit. At Newry the late minister, Rev. J. N. Crozier, received an annuity of £70 a year, a little more than the investment of the Commutation Grant produced. His death has recently set this amount free, and in consequence the congregation has lost its previous grants from the Rights of Conscience and Dunbar Funds. The investment, which was a favourable one, will, however, be paid off in the course of two or three years, and as the capital sum does not exceed £1,100, the net addition to the minister's stipend will not, ultimately, be large. If they can, however, connect themselves with the Irish Sustentation Fund, the annual grant might be expected to remain at £60. I had the opportunity of a hearty and hospitable welcome from several members of the congregation, many of whom had gone to attend the funeral of a deceased member. The old graveyard at some distance, which adjoins a nunnery, contains the ruins of the former meeting-house, and is filled with many handsome monuments, one of which, erected in memory of the Irish patriot Mitchell, is the object of numerous pilgrimages.

Belfast has four chapels, as well as a Domestic Mission. To only two of these was my visit special, as receiving assistance from the English Sustentation Fund. But I visited the old-established meeting-house of the first congregation, a handsome building fronting Rosemary-street, a short street in the centre of the city branching out of the Royal-avenue. It is, curiously, an oval in shape, and is adorned with many handsome monuments to members who have distinguished themselves for their civic virtues or professional attainments. A large congregational hall adjoins, and the Unitarian Depository is only two doors away. Behind the meeting-house stands the chapel in which the congregation, now assembling at All Souls' Church, in Elmwood-avenue, formerly met, which will be sold to assist in defraying the expense of building their new house. I attended the evening service on July 16 at this new church, which is a fine and well-designed building, looking very handsome in its present condition, but suggesting capabilities of as much further decoration as the tastes and feelings of the congregation may desire. The Rev. E. I. Frigg gave an interesting and spirited lecture on the painter Raphael, his artistic education at Perugia, and his subsequent work. The service resembled the first in Dr. Martineau's Prayer-book, and was very nicely conducted. A congregation of about a hundred was present, though the evening was bright and the weather suggestive of open-air pursuits.

On July 23 I attended the morning service in York-street Meeting-house, of which the Rev. A. Ashworth is minister. It is a bright modern building in the central thoroughfare of the city. There is also a very good Congregational Hall in which the Sunday-school is held. At my visit there were present about fifteen scholars, which was below the average attendance. In this chapel, as in the others at Belfast, service is held both morning and evening, although sometimes evening services are suspended in the summer months. The congregation has lost considerably in the last year or two owing to the death of some leading members, whose place it is difficult to fill, and on the very morning of my attendance a memorial service was held for the wife of Mr. Gordon, secretary of the congregation. Besides an efficient choir, a respectable congregation of about sixty persons was present at the service. The situation of this church in the business part of the town is unfavourable for the increase of the congregation, which, however, keeps steadily on its course; being, as appears to be the case with our Irish congregations, undisturbed by great or rapid fluctuations in its membership.

The chapel at Mountpottinger (Belfast) stands well at a meeting of four roads. It is a modern building, and, owing to the increase of the congregation, has recently been enlarged by the addition of transepts. Three very beautiful stained windows adorn the end over the Communion table. There is ground behind the chapel upon which the congregation are desirous of erecting a schoolroom. The Rev. W. J. Davies has been minister here three years, and as his chapel is in a residential part of the city, he has succeeded in attracting additional members. There appears to be a very earnest and active spirit in the congregation, and there was a good attendance of about a hundred on the evening of my visit, July 23. I did not see their Sunday-school, but there are seventy scholars on the roll. To their spirited secretary, Mr. James Davidson, as well as to the Rev. A. Ashworth and the Rev. James Hall of Crumlin, among many others, I am indebted for much information, hospitality, and help in effecting my purpose of visiting the congregations in Ireland, aided by the English Sustentation Fund, and I trust that my visit may lead to an effort by our Irish friends for an increase of that fund.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ballyhemlin, Co. Down.—The annual report of this congregation, passed on Sunday last, shows a continued improvement in members, attendances, and finances. A series of Popular Sunday Evening Services for the People are being largely attended by the general public. The congregation have presented their minister, the Rev. Charles Thrift, with a bicycle as an aid to his pastoral work in the villages of the district.

Moretonhampstead.—The congregation of Cross Chapel have again to chronicle the fact that one of their members has passed away. Mrs. Hannah Short, mother of the organist, fell asleep, Aug. 13, after a long and painful illness, bravely and patiently borne, and was laid to rest in the little graveyard adjoining the chapel, on Wednesday, Aug. 16.

Stockport.—On Thursday, the 3rd inst., a very successful bicycle picnic took place to Rostherne Mere. About forty ladies and gentlemen, members of the congregation and friends, rode on cycles, and about twelve in a wagnette, the weather being all that could be desired. On the following Thursday one of the most enjoyable of garden parties was held at Bramall Grange, by the kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Hollins. Games of cricket, rounders, croquet, &c., were organised; refreshments were provided in addition to the tea, and the weather being perfect everything was much enjoyed. A vote of thanks was proposed by the Rev. B. C. Constable, seconded by Mr. R. T. Heys, and responded to by Mr. Hollins. On Saturday, the 12th inst., about thirty-five of the Sunday-school teachers and scholars went to spend a week at the Old Hall, Great Hucklow, in Derbyshire. They returned on the following Saturday after a most enjoyable holiday. The Old Hall has been hired by the Manchester District Sunday School Association for the use of the affiliated schools in turn; and at the cost of about 13s. for an adult, and 7s. 6d. for a child, every teacher and scholar may secure a week's holiday, including board and lodging, and railway fare. Some few slept at cottages in the village. The Rev. B. C. Constable and his wife and family also spent the week in the village. Besides games in the fields, excursions were taken to Chatsworth, Castleton, Eyam, and other places of interest; and the weather for the first five days being perfect the holiday was much enjoyed.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE clouds still hang heavily over the Transvaal, but if after all the calamity and disgrace of war are not averted, it would seem that the guilt will lie chiefly at the door of mischievous and unscrupulous journalists, and those from whom they take their tone. It is inconceivable that the matters in dispute cannot be arranged by reasonable methods, unless there are hidden and sinister forces at work, determined and sufficiently strong to allow no peaceful settlement. Our people, we are assured, cannot believe that war is possible, yet Dr. Clifford warns us that this country is in danger of committing "a terrible, an inexpiable crime." Mr. Frederic Harrison in his open letter to Lord Salisbury, published this week, also urges that the majority of Englishmen know that such a war would be unjust, even though many of them still desire that it should go on. "It is not true, however loudly it be repeated, that the great majority of Englishmen do seek to push the war to the end. Noisy, arrogant, and trading groups of men, organised and intriguing for their own ends, are doing this. But they are not the nation. On all sides there are quiet protests being raised against it, by men of all parties and of all interests, outside those interests which are playing their own game."

And further, Mr. Harrison urges that it is in accordance with the honourable traditions of this country that a paramount Power should submit to international engagements, to public law and to justice as between the weak and the strong. "We as a nation, you as Minister, have steadily resisted the claim of any Power calling itself paramount to seize what it can and to coerce those who refuse to be despoiled. If the Colonial Office defies these honourable traditions, if the new diplomacy is to develop also a new morality, a new public law, whether moved by timidity or by pique, it remains for the Chief Minister of the Crown and the head of the Foreign Office to maintain our record of freedom and of justice, before we are dragged into a war the wickedness of which is certain, but the end of which no man can foresee."

It is always the obvious which is longest overlooked. Posterity will point to the Dreyfus case as a capital instance of how truth and justice depart from a morality which hath not love. Militarism and anti-Semitism are only phases of the disease which followed the disgrace of France in 1870. The sentiment of "La Revanche" is not dead or dying, and it marks a national ethic in which hate is a cardinal virtue. The effect of such perversion was never more lamentably shown than in the evidence of M. de Freycinet. A civilian, a man widely and deeply respected in this country, he had declared from the Ministerial Bench in the Chamber that he possessed proof of Dreyfus's guilt. This assertion, more than all the previous asseverations of military Ministers, had staggered the faith of foreigners in the innocence of the accused man. On Tuesday M. de Freycinet explained the real meaning of his answer. He does not even affect to have considered for one moment the justice or the truth of the matter: one consideration alone occurred to him—the probable effect of his reply upon the discipline of the army. "I adjure those of my countrymen," says he, "who participate in these attacks under the impulse of generous passion, with the object of serving a noble and elevated idea, to take heed of the dangers in which they may involve the country." The attacks referred to are the exposures of General Mercier and his tools. The generous passion, the noble and elevated idea, are reverence and love for truth and justice; these have, he implies, a kind of sentimental charm, but "what would be the result if we were engaged in external difficulties?"

At the meeting of the Sanitary Congress at Southampton on Tuesday, Sir William Preece delivered his Presidential Address, in which he extolled Moses as the greatest sanitary engineer the world had ever known, and the Book of Leviticus as a treatise on Hygiene. Moses had laid down laws concerning the necessity of pure air, water, food, soil, dwellings, and bodies. He ordered refuse to be burnt outside the camp, and the modern refuse destructor had only followed with lagging steps that ancient injunction. Sir William urged the advantage of using sea water for public purposes, where it was available, in order to husband the fresh water supply for domestic use. The importance of ventilation and fresh air was dwelt upon, and the danger in the use of unsterilised milk, as being greater than that of meat, so that it was wise to boil all milk before it was used. In conclusion he said that engineering progress and scientific research brought them face to face with the great generalisation that Nature was only another term for God, that Nature's laws were His thoughts, and everywhere the stars in their courses and the bacteria in their operations followed one fixed and settled design.

MONDAY was the hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of Goethe's birth, and it was celebrated with special enthusiasm in Weimar and in Frankfort where he was born. A very interesting article in last week's Spectator on "Goethe and Germany" contrasted the great poet and his contemporary, the patriot Stein, of whose meeting in Cologne Cathedral soon after Waterloo, Arndt gives a vivid account:—

On the one hand, was the passionately patriotic statesman who not only abolished the old feudal régime in Prussia, but who also inspired with his indomitable courage the Prussian people in the life and death struggle with Napoleon. On the other hand, was the great modern poet, the Welt-kind, as he truly called himself, who said that he did not know what patriotism was, and was glad to be without it since it obscured those true views of the world and deflected from its right aims that human culture which Goethe thought more vital to human progress than all politics.

And yet, as the writer of the Spectator article says, Germany had need of the poet as well as the patriot.

No great poet can touch the soul deeply without in the long run touching the whole man and leading to the growth of powers unsuspected by himself. Goethe was the great founder of German culture, and that means that he, of all others, stimulated the spirit of knowledge, of research, of comprehensive inquiry into the truth of things. This unquestionably is the spirit which, in spite of some patent defects in the German mind and temper, has made Germany great in these latter years and has sent her sons into all lands to spread industry and invention. This is the spirit which has developed German art and music, and which has enabled German science to achieve such triumphs. Little minds and a great Empire, said Burke, do not go together, and Goethe, by helping to develop a great intellect in Germany, has, we think, done more for merely political Germany than superficial minds would suppose. As a man as well as a poet, as a German as well as a philosopher, Frankfort is justified in celebrating the memory of her greatest son.

LORD HALIFAX, as President, has issued a manifesto, to the lay members of the English Church Union, in which he vigorously controverts the justice of the Archbishop's decision as to the ceremonial use of incense in the Church. Of the now famous Lambeth "Opinion" he says:—

I will say that it seems to me to be one of the greatest misfortunes that has fallen on the Church since the rise of the Oxford Movement; and for this reason: the "Opinion" does everything that such a document could do to discredit and reduce to an unreality the appeal which the Church of England has ever made to the practice of the whole Catholic Church of Christ as supplying her standard of doctrine and ceremonial. That appeal has been the great weapon with which, ever since the suspension of communion with Rome, the Church of England has always met the censures of Rome on the one hand, and the attacks of Puritan and Protestant controversialists on the other. This is a matter of history. The use of incense in Divine service (to the consideration of which point alone I shall confine myself) was exactly a matter which surely should have been tested by the appeal to Catholic practice. Consider how the matter stands. No one disputes the fact that the use of incense in public worship was never by name forbidden, though it was commonly so employed at the time of the compilation of the Book of Common Prayer. The utmost that was done at that time was to omit all reference to the use of incense in the rubrics. In this respect the use of incense stood in exactly the same position as the use of an organ in public worship. Both were customarily used in Divine service before the promulgation of the English Prayer-book. Neither was mentioned as required to be used in that Book; neither was forbidden. Organs, only by use and wont, and by the toleration of authorities, continued to be used. Incense dropped, almost generally, out of use.

The Primate's reference to the Act of Uniformity is specially repugnant to the High Churchmen, and Lord Halifax urges on the contrary that the provisions of the Act are not, and never can be, fully observed.

Moreover, be it not forgotten that the Act which the Archbishops insist on applying in this instance with such rigid severity contains plain injunctions which they will never think of putting into force. The Act provides that everyone who fails to attend Divine service in his parish church or some authorised place of worship each Sunday and holy-day, shall be visited by Church censures, and fined "twelve pence" for each offence. The churchwardens are to levy the fine, and the Bishops are commanded in the most solemn terms to see that this good and wholesome law is enforced. This is just as much a requirement of the Act as any other requirement contained in it; but it would be foolish to ask seriously if the Archbishops have the slightest intention of enforcing this provision at all, while they seek to enforce the observance of another provision with the most rigid severity.

This, no doubt, is true of the letter of the law, and yet it remains a fact that the Church of England did set itself definitely against the Roman doctrines and ritual, of which incense is an integral part, and which on that very account has now become so precious to the extreme Ritualists. If the Archbishop's ruling is now to be obeyed Lord Halifax urges that it must be only a formal obedience, and with a studied grudgingness, hoping for better days, and the laity are strongly urged to stand by their priests, whatever course they decide to pursue.

IN connection with the Paris Exhibition of 1900, it is proposed to hold an International Congress on the History of Religions, from Sept. 3rd to the 9th. The opening and closing meetings will be held in the Congress Hall of the Exhibition, the sectional meetings at the Sorbonne. It is proposed that the work of the Congress should be divided into nine sections: (1) Religions of non-civilised races; (2) The Far East, China and Japan, &c.; (3) Egypt; (4) Semitic religions, including Judaism and Islam; (5) India and Persia; (6) Greece and Rome; (7) Germans, Celts and Slavs; (8) History of Christianity in three sub-sections, the early centuries, the middle ages, and modern times. In the preliminary programme, suggesting special subjects for consideration and inviting the co-operation of scholars, the subject under the section of the Christianity of Modern Times is "The Influence of the Philosophy of Kant and of that of Hegel on Historical Criticism as applied to the Origins of Christianity." The work of the Congress is to be strictly historical, and dogmatic controversy is forbidden. The committee, of which M. Albert Réville is chairman, includes Protestants and Roman Catholics and Jews. Dean Sabatier and Professor Bonet-Maury are members. The secretaries are MM. Jean Réville and Leon Marillier, who are to be addressed at the Sorbonne. The minimum subscription is fixed at 10fr. All communications intended for the Congress must reach the secretaries by July 1, 1900.

THE Rev. R. A. Armstrong, whose interesting notes on Newfoundland we publish to-day, contributes an article on the same subject to this week's Christian World, under the title "The Land of Fog and Cod." As to the ecclesiastical conditions of the island, Mr. Armstrong mentions a Presbyterian and a Congregational minister in St. John's, and the Salvation Army are there, but the three chief bodies into which the population is divided are the Catholic, the Anglican, and the Methodist.

Education is entirely denominational. The Government grant is parcelled out in a lump sum to each of the three great denominations according to population, and the denominational authorities apportion it out among the several churches at their own discretion. Nor does it depend on any kind of Government inspection. These things considered, education appears to be wonderfully efficient, and there is a singular absence of sectarian acrimony, though the child of one denomination is often compelled to go to a school of another or to none at all.

One other passage from this article we must be allowed to quote, with the strong advice to our readers to procure for themselves the whole:—

Though Newfoundland is far enough from the Arctic Zone, yet the chill Arctic Stream sweeps down the eastern shore. Meeting and mingling with the Gulf Stream to the east, it creates the dense wall of fog which hangs as a veil between the Atlantic mariner and the coast. But it also brings down in stately procession the mighty icebergs which are at once the terror and the glory of the Newfoundland waters. Looming suddenly through the fog on the bows of an Atlantic steamer they are grim and terrible craft to meet. They hang out no lights. They sound no fog-horn. They respect no international rule of the road. But stranded in the shallows about the bays and promontories of the island, and glinting in the sunshine, they are objects of exquisite beauty. Now right-lined and vertical as a castle or an abbey, now swelling with graceful curve and sweep of outline, with the water streaming from them in many a miniature cascade, while their own little bays and pools are of that rare bright green so ravishing in the rivers of Norway, silvery and golden themselves in the blazing light, they fascinate and enchant the beholder, and add immeasurably to the beauty of rock and coast-line.

THE Thurso School Board recently decided to appoint a teacher of cookery, and after investigating applications, inclined towards that of a French lady, who produced excellent testimonials. Then uprose Mr. James McKidd, and solemnly warned his colleagues to think twice before introducing so dangerous an element into their staff, for, said he, "I do not know what church she goes to, and it is likely she is a Roman Catholic." The word of caution was enough. Another candidate, whose religious leanings were known to Mr. McKidd was preferred, and the rock-buns and lemon-soufflets of Thurso are saved from even the risk of Jesuit leaven.

THE following letter from Mr. P. M. Martineau, dated Esher, Aug. 20, appeared in last week's Spectator:—

"Sir,—Thirty or forty years ago, Henry S. Bicknell and I went to that beautiful spot, Chipstead, Surrey. In the churchyard there he noticed with his keen eye—was ever eye keener, ever appreciation reader!—some lines on a tombstone. He thought them quite out of the class of verse on neighbouring tombstones—laments for 'tender wife and mother dear,' plaints that 'physicians sore long time we bore'—and he noted them. I went thither again to-day alone. The tombstone stands, but the lines can be made out no longer. They should not be lost; here they are:—

Edward Vernon, died 1810, aged 79.
Here Vernon lies, who living taught the way
How best to spend man's short important day;
To virtuous toil his morn of life was given
And vig'rous noon—his evening hours to Heaven.
Long ere the night approached his task was done,
And mildly cheerful shone his setting sun;
Nor pain nor sickness could such peace destroy
His faith was certainty, his hope was joy.
Good, wise, and tranquil, eminently blest,
Content he lived, and joyful sank to rest."

WHAT thing thou lovest most, thou mak'st its nature thine;
Earthly, if that be earth—if that be God,
divine.—R. C. Trench.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

LITERATURE.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL AND HIS FRIENDS.*

The title of this delightful book is rightly chosen, for it does not pretend to be a complete biography of Lowell. It gathers up, with some additions and corrections, a series of twelve papers contributed by Dr. Hale to the Outlook, of New York, rich in reminiscence and anecdote, recorded in the most natural and charming manner by a prince of story-tellers. Lowell entered Harvard College in 1834, and Hale in the following year, when Samuel Longfellow also entered; from the intimate friendship then begun and continued unbroken through a long life, at some periods with often daily intercourse, Dr. Hale produces many vivid pictures, and with the insight of true affection brings very clearly before his readers the attractive and noble personality of his friend.

The book is also enriched by a series of most interesting portraits and other illustrations, forty-two in all, including facsimiles of some of Lowell's notes and poems and corrected proof sheets. Of the poet himself there are portraits from different periods of his life, and a reproduction of the exquisite crayon drawing of Maria Lowell, his first wife, lovely in spirit as in feature, an ideal poet's wife, who wrote those tender verses on "The Alpine Sheep," which have comforted so many hearts stricken with the loss of a little child. Among the portraits of friends and contemporaries we find an amusing full-length presentment of Oliver Wendell Holmes, taken in 1862, also Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, in 1860, William W. Story, James T. Fields, Charles Eliot Norton, Asa Gray, Louis Agassiz, and Thomas Hughes. The portrait of Edward Tyrrel Channing, brother of Dr. Channing, is of special interest. He was one of the teachers at Harvard in Lowell's College days. The reference to him is characteristic of Dr. Hale's manner in this book. Most of the work at Harvard in those days, Dr. Hale says, was done in rather dreary recitations, but Channing had different methods and met his pupils face to face and hand to hand:—

He deserves the credit of the English of Emerson, Holmes, Sumner, Clarke, Bellows, Lowell, Higginson, and other men whom he trained. Their English did more credit to Harvard College, I think, than any other of its achievements for those thirty-two years. You sat, physically, at his side. He read your theme aloud with you—so loud, if he pleased, that all of the class who were present could hear his remarks of praise or ridicule. "Yes, we used to have white paper and black ink; now we have blue paper, and blue ink." I wonder if Mr. Emerson did not get from him the oracle, "Leave out the adjectives, and let the nouns do the fighting." I think that is Emerson's. Or whose is it?

Of Longfellow, who came to Harvard as Professor of Modern Literature at the beginning of Lowell's third year, and the year after his younger brother Samuel Longfellow had entered as a student, Dr. Hale speaks very warmly for what he did to raise the standard of teaching and the tone of the College.

Longfellow succeeded, as no other man did, in breaking that line of belt ice which separated the students from their teachers. Partly, perhaps, because he was so young; partly because he was agreeable and charming; partly because he had the manners of a man of the world; because he had spoken French in Paris and Italian in Florence; but chief of all because he chose, he was companion and friend of the undergraduates. He would talk with them and walk with them; would sit with them and smoke with them. You played whist with him if you met him of an evening. You never spoke contemptuously of him, and he never patronised you.

Lowell belonged to Cambridge, and so was familiar with Harvard College from his earliest years. His father, the Rev. Charles Lowell, had been for many years a minister in Boston, but had removed to Cambridge before James was born. There are several pictures of the charming old house, "Elmwood," which throughout life was Lowell's home. This will perhaps partly account for the absence of veneration for College regulations which the brilliant youth displayed, and which in his senior year, to the dismay of his friends, led to Lowell's rustication to Concord, where he was sent to study for the rest of the term with a certain Dr. Barzillai Frost, and where Emerson was very kind to him. Dr. Hale, in telling of this, takes occasion to contradict some absurd stories as to the gravity of Lowell's offences in his youthful insubordination, for which, as an intimate fellow-student in those days, he declares there was no shadow of ground.

Dr. Hale has many pleasant things to relate of those early College days, of the early literary efforts of the brilliant group of young men among whom Lowell was a leading spirit, of his more mature essays as poet and man of letters, his thoroughness as an editor, and subsequently as professor of modern literature at Harvard, and finally at the American Embassy in Spain and in this country. And inwoven with all that is personal to Lowell is much interesting reminiscence of a contemporary concerning other matters and other people, of the reform of book-selling in Boston, of the growth of American journalism, of the anti-slavery struggle and the war. Among the many good stories about other people is this one concerning Arthur Hugh Clough.

He was a charming poet, and I cannot but think a charming companion. I always think of him as a bishop "in partibus," a bishop without a mitre or a see. For Mr. Emerson told me an interesting story of Clough. He was one of a cluster of young men who had taken great delight in Emerson, on his visit in 1848 in England. When that visit was over, and Mr. Emerson sailed for America on his return, Clough accompanied him to Liverpool and bade him good-bye on the deck of the steamer. As they walked up and down the deck together, Clough said sadly, "What shall we do without you? Think where we are. Carlyle has led us all out into the desert, and he has left us there"—a remark which was exactly true. Emerson said in reply that very many of the fine young men in England had said this to him as he went up and down in his journeys there. "And I put my hand upon his head as we walked, and I said, 'Clough, I consecrate you Bishop of all England. It shall be your part to go up and down through the desert to find out these wanderers and lead them to the promised land!'" I do not know, but I am afraid that Clough never thought himself in the promised land, nor scarcely upon any Pisgah looking down upon it. But I tell the story, as showing how highly Emerson thought of Clough as far back as 1849.

Of the "Biglow Papers," Dr. Hale says that their dialect is no burlesque or exaggeration, but simply perfect New England talk. It was this book, which, he had often been told, first introduced Lowell to this country. "You can never tell what they will like in England, or what they will not like. But this is clear, that, having little or no humour of their own, they are curiously alive for humour in others." Are we to take this as a touch of American humour, or must the countrymen of Shakespeare and Sterne, of Thackeray and Charles Lamb, and George Eliot seriously rest under that dreadful imputation?

Dr. Hale prints a good number of Lowell's letters. There is one amusing note to Dr. Hill, the President of Harvard College, in 1863, about the trees in the College yard, of which Lowell says: "They remind me always of a young author's first volume of poems. There are too many of 'em, and too many of one kind. If they were not planted in such formal rows, they would typify very well John Bull's notion of our 'our democracy,' where every tree is its neighbour's enemy, and all turn out scrubs in the end, because none can develop fairly."

We want more variety, more grouping. We want to learn that one fine tree is worth more than any mob of second-rate ones. We want to take a leaf out of Chaucer's book, and understand that in a stately grove every tree must "stand well from his fellow apart." A doom hangs over us in the matter of architecture, but if we will only let a tree alone it will build itself with a nobleness of proportion and grace of detail that Giotto himself might have envied. Nor should the pruning, as now, be trusted to men who get all they cut off, and whose whole notion of pruning, accordingly, is "ax and it shall be given unto you." Do, pray, take this matter into your own hands—for you know how to love a tree—and give us a modern instance of a wise saw. Be remembered among your other good things as the president that planted the groups of evergreens for the wind to dream of the sea in all summer, and for snowflakes to roost on all winter, and believe me (at the end of my sheet, though not of my sermon) always cordially yours, J. R. LOWELL.

We might linger a long time over this book with unabated pleasure, but must be content with a final reference to Lowell's truly religious nature. His father, in giving his name as a contributor to a fund for securing freedom and religious instruction to Kansas, wrote in 1855: "I do not consent to its being announced as the minister of a Unitarian or Trinitarian church in the common acceptance of those terms. If there is anything which I have uniformly, distinctly, and emphatically declared, it is that I have adopted no other religious creed than the Bible, and no other name than Christian as denoting my religious faith." His son was undoubtedly a Unitarian by personal conviction, but with the broadest sympathies. Dr. Hale says of him:—

He says sometimes in joke that he hates to go to church. I am afraid that most men who could preach as well as he would say the same thing with the chances of the ordinary religious service. But he also says, "If Dr. Donne or Jeremy Taylor, or even Dr. South, were the preacher, perhaps —." As it happens, I recollect no expressions of his more enthusiastic than those in which he described public services of religion. His mother had belonged to the Church of England, and his love for the Prayer-book was associated with his earliest recollections of her.

Writing to a friend towards the close of his life, Lowell said: "I don't care where the notion of immortality came from. . . . It is there, and I mean to hold it fast. Suppose we don't know? How much do we know, after all? . . . The last time I was ill, I lost all consciousness of my flesh. I was dispersed through space in some inconceivable fashion and mixed with the Milky Way. . . . Yet the very fact that I had a confused consciousness all the while of the Milky Way as something to be mingled with, proved that I was there as much an individual as ever. There is something in the flesh that is superior to the flesh, something that can in finer moments abolish matter and pain. And it is to this we must cling.

FREETHOUGHT.*

THE writer of this notice may as well confess that he opened the book with no very enthusiastic expectations. A history of Freethought suggests a history of the Opposition, a kind of thing that is likely to err by excess as well as by defect, a work likely to have little coherence and continuity of interest. These presentiments could very well be justified by the book itself; but it is satisfactory to remark that, notwithstanding defects due to the nature of the design, the book represents a considerable amount of research, the results of which will be interesting to the general reader, and suggestive to the student. Certainly one cannot but be irritated at times by the constant recurrence of the words freethought and freethinking: it seems so absurd to waste one's time in inquiring exactly how much certain authors denied and rejected and ignored, when we are dealing with men who were so much more than deniers—men of positive and earnest thought. Lucretius might have disbelieved the old Greek fables, and have scoffed at men's superstitious fears, and yet have left no single page worth the trouble of transcription. It is the passionate earnestness with which he has given us positive thought, it is the intensity of conviction which makes his writing valuable. It is the passionate faith of an unbeliever that awakens our sympathy. The serenity and freedom from human interest which he ascribes to the gods have no counterpart in his own mind. He gasps for utterance, he must make known that which he has seen with his eyes, and reasoned in his thought. No Hebrew prophet had a more irrepressible impulse to speak to the people; no prophet knew more certainly that to the great majority of his countrymen his message would be delivered in vain.

Socrates is described as "fundamentally and practically a Freethinker," on the ground that "in all things he thought for himself." If the classification is sound it might have been applied as emphatically to St. Paul, who, however, is in this book treated with great brevity and an entire absence of sympathy.

The chapter which deals with the English Deistic movement is carefully and genially written; and deserves the especial attention of those who have made acquaintance with Leslie Stephen's account of the same period.

The treatment of recent times and recent men, necessarily brief, seems to the present writer very seldom just. President Lincoln is described as a "non-Christian Deist, and an agnostic Deist at that" (at what?); we gather from several comments that the most extreme of modern writers, Huxley, Spencer, Andrew White, Draper, and Buckle are none of them quite as freethinking as they should be. It may be doubted whether any more than one pure, unsullied Freethinker ever lived. What the influence of this book may be in producing others time must show. It is pleasant, however, to be provoked to study afresh the writings of some of the world's great teachers; and just as the fanatics who declare that Shakespeare was a Roman Catholic, or that St. Paul's chief epistles are forgeries, or that the Gospel parables came from Buddhistic sources, do us the benefit of compelling us to re-read our documents and re-test our theories, so many a one will be sent by this book to authors that he once was familiar with but has long neglected, or to authors that he never was conversant with and has often wished to know.

The printing of a part of the work in smaller type is not an improvement. Exactly the same sort of argument goes on alike in the big type and the small; the latter would have been better used if it had been rigidly confined to quotations. It is difficult to choose a quotation from a book dealing with so many epochs and so many authors. But the following may be given as a fair sample of the style:—

What marks off the book of Job from all other Hebrew literature is its dramatic and reflective handling of the ethical problem of theism, which the prophets either evade or dismiss by declamation against Jewish sins. Not that it is solved in Job, where the rôle of Satan is an inconclusive resort to the Persian dualistic solution, and where the Deity is finally made to answer Job's freethinking by sheer literary thunder, much less ratiocinative though far more artistic than the theistic speeches of the friends. But at least the writer or writers of Job's speeches consciously grasped the issue; and the writer of the epilogue evidently felt that the least Yahveh could do was to compensate a man whom he had allowed to be wantonly persecuted.

A brief extract dealing with a modern and well-known writer must close this notice.

Gibbon, educated not by Oxford but by the recent scholarly literature of France, had as a mere boy seen, on reading Bossuet, the theoretic weakness of Protestantism, and had straightway professed Romanism. Shaken as to that by a skilled Swiss Protestant, he speedily became a rationalist pure and simple, with as little of the dregs of Deism in him as any writer of his age; and his great work begins or rather signalises (since Hume and Robertson preceded him) a new era of historical writing, not merely by its sociological treatment of the rise of Christianity, but by its absolutely anti-theological handling of all things.

We have taken the liberty to italicise one brief clause because it illustrates the profoundly melancholy impression which the loyal son of Freethought must receive from this short history. To think that even Gibbon suffered from certain "dregs of Deism!" "To be honest," says Hamlet, "is to be one man picked out of ten thousand"; we are inclined to think that to be a Freethinker, in the Robertsonian sense of the word, is to stand absolutely alone in all the pitiless universe; such a man has no predecessor and no peer, he cannot well hope for posterity, for it is doubtful whether the powers of Nature can ever evolve the like again. J. RUDDLE.

A SOUL'S TRAVAIL.

A WEARY man lay dying. Unconfessed,
A bygone sin had weighed upon his soul
Year after year, and all those weary years
His life had seemed to his o'erburdened mind

A living lie amongst the sons of men.
On earth no mortal trod that knew his shame

And he alone could tell the gaping world
The whited sepulchre he was!

The wife moved out
He loved, his children, e'en his very foes,
(And he had many), all believed him true,
And proudly had he worn his spotless robe

In church and mart, in council and in court.

But life is short, and all things have their end,

So now he lay a-dying.

At his head,
Unseen of him, unseen of all around,
Two spirits stood, contending for his soul:
An angel, one; the other, sin-begot;
Each uttering ghostly counsels in his ear, Till 'twixt the two his heart was rent in twain.

Spake one in stern and unrelenting tone:
"Confess thy crime and save thy wretched soul!

Thy sin is rank before the hosts of Heaven

And, unconfessed, will drag thee down to hell!

Abase thyself! Fear not the scorn of man,
But let the world now know thee as thou art!"

The death-dews gathered thickly on his brow,

And they that watched his mortal agony Beheld him shrink and wither in the strife.

Within himself he pleaded, "Woe is me!
Long years I have repented of my sin,
And by long years of righteousness have striven

To wash away its stain. Why should I now,

When all men deem me pure, heap on myself

Mountains of condemnation and of shame?"

Then spake the voice again: "What matters it

What man may think of thee! Save thou thy soul!

Fool! Dost thou think to face the bar of Heaven,

And thy All righteous Judge, with such a plea?

Hast thou forgotten for one single hour,
Through all those weary years, thy hidden sin,

And shall th' All-seeing Eye o'erlook its stain?

Purge thou thyself of this so-black offence

By tearing off the mask thou long hast worn!

Confess, and save thy soul!—There yet is time!"

* A short history of Freethought ancient and modern. By J. M. Robertson. S. nennschein, 7s. 6d. net.

Then spake the other: "Think, before thou speak'st!
If thou shouldst now reveal thy secret sore
And blazon to the world thy deed of ill,
Who should believe in righteousness again?
A ghastly murrain would destroy the faith
Of young and old alike. If thou wert false,
Who, then, were true? With hard, suspicious gaze
Each one would scan his brother, deeming so
He, like thyself, might be a hypocrite—
A goodly tomb, full up of rottenness!"

Quick spake in piercing tone the former voice:
"Heed not the subtle plea, but save thyself!
What hast thou now to do with mortal man,
When God stands waiting to condemn or quit?"

The weeping wife stooped low to kiss the brow
O'er which the shadows chill were creeping fast.
"Dear heart!" she said. "Dear husband,
fond and true,
Hast thou no parting word for me, thy wife?
No dying charge for these, thy children
dear?"

"Speak!" quoth the voice. "Speak! ere it be too late!"

"Stay!" saith the other. "Wouldst thou break her heart
And leave her desolate in life and death?
She trusts thee: wilt thou tear her trust in shreds?
She honours thee: must she now deem thee vile?
She loves thee: wilt thou crucify her love
And crown it with the thorns of deathless pain?
Wilt thou, to save thyself, strip her of all
That makes life precious? Wilt thou swiftly blast
By one weak moment them that call thee
Sire,
And give thy sons and daughters thy foul
shame
To be their heritage in coming years?
If for thy sin an endless hell await,
Take thou thy wages, and in silence die!"

"Nay! speak, and save thy dying soul alive!
Thy time is short! Confess, ere 'tis in vain!"

Upon the weeping wife and children fair
The fading eyes turned, full of wistful love,
And straight the choice was made: the strife was o'er.

"If Heaven means woe to them, I cannot speak!
'Tho' in the deepest Hell my place is kept
There let my drear eternity drag on.
Almighty! do what seemeth good to Thee!"

So, with a parting smile of fondest cheer
The sinner passed away; his travail o'er!

Which was the conqueror?

The tempter fled. . . .
The Angel smiled and heavenward winged her way!

"He that would save his life," she loudly sang,
"Shall lose himself! He that for love's
dear sake
Would lose his life, shall gain it evermore!
There is no Heaven but Love; no Hell
but fear!
He hath loved much, and love hath purged
away
All that remained of his long-sorrowed sin!"

THE PROBLEMS OF NEWFOUND- LAND.

It may perhaps not be wholly without interest if, having just returned from a trip to Newfoundland and that strip of the coast of Labrador which is under Newfoundland administration, I jot down some first impressions of some of the social and political problems which present themselves to the citizens of "England's oldest colony." The political constitution of Newfoundland is itself curiously interesting; for it is almost the exact reproduction of our millennium-evolved constitution at home on the minutest scale imaginable. The whole population of the island and the associated fringe of Labrador is about one-third of that of Liverpool.
Yet we have Upper and Lower Houses, a responsible Ministry, and all the paraphernalia of Westminster—Black Rod, Ser-jeant-at-Arms, and a veritable mace of painted wood. I attended the closing of the Legislature, and was conducted by the lady engrossing clerk to a seat within the bar of the Upper House and close to the throne, while the deputy Black Rod politely set Windsor chairs for the fashion and beauty of St. John's. Then deputy Black Rod went to summon the Lower House—36 all told—to the bar, and the Speaker, at the head of his flock, stood bowing his acknowledgments while the Governor—not in the Queen's name, but in his own—assented to Bill after Bill, the harvest of the Session's labours. The Upper House itself—appointed by the Crown—is limited to fifteen members.
The Cabinet comprises six individuals.
You can hardly walk the length of Water-street without stumbling upon Premiers and ex-Premiers, or seeing honourable members chatting at their shop doors.
No man so humble but he can have speech of the greatest of the land; for the greatest only the other day were themselves at the bottom of the social ladder.

Unhappily the population seems too small to produce a sufficient supply of politicians of the higher order. There is more than a suspicion that the greater number seek political position for what they can get. Though party-spirit runs high, and the party-press is probably the most acrimonious in the world, yet no man—save one enthusiastic tailor—could tell me by what principle the parties were divided; and few men had any better thing to say of the leaders of the party they espoused than that the leaders of the other side were worse.

But mean and corrupt as Newfoundland politics appear to be, the colony affords a striking example of that which Mr. Bryce has remarked in his American Commonwealth, the sound and wholesome moral life which may exist side by side with political corruption. The character of the people at large cannot but impress the stranger favourably. The pluck, energy, and endurance of the fisher population are manifest to any one who sees as much of the shore as I saw; and the fisher population is almost all there is, for as yet ground has hardly been broken in the interior. The cod and the seals are the wealth of Newfoundland—above all, the cod. From hundreds of rock-girt har-bours the little sloops venture out on a storm-rocked sea and daily face the billows and the ice-bergs to reap that wonderful harvest which the hand of no man has sown. For months together in the winter each of the tiny fishing hamlets is cut off by the ice and the snow-bound forest from all communication with its neighbours or any outside world. Each settlement is prevalingly Catholic, Episcopalian, or Methodist, as the case may be. The Church and the School-house afford the only larger life. The fisherman builds his own house and his own boat. A stock of flour is laid in from St. John's by the village storekeeper before the winter sets in. And if so be that the ice is late in breaking up, a whole village may be on short rations through long weeks of the harsh spring, because neither foot-path nor water-track is open to the passage of man.

To a population absolutely dependent on the fish—and "fish" means cod and cod alone—salmon, trout, herrings, however abundant, simply are not fish in Newfoundland—such a question as the famous French foreshore question is necessarily one of the most vital and personal interest. It is very hard to obtain a clear presentment of that question. It rises from the Treaties of Utrecht (1713) and Paris (1763). The Newfoundlanders' contention is that those treaties simply and solely gave French fishermen the right to take cod in certain Newfoundland waters and to dry them on the shore, that shore remaining British territory and British subjects having equal rights of fishery with French, so long as neither should interfere with the other. The French contention, on the other hand, is that French rights on the foreshore are exclusive; and from time to time they have practically claimed actual lordship of the soil, putting every obstruction, for instance, in the way of the building of a railway station at Port au Basque for the western terminus of the recent cross-country line. It is difficult to find a word in the treaties themselves to give colour to the French pretensions, while they have incontrovertibly violated other clauses of the agreement. The British Government have been profuse in promises to the exasperated fishermen. But meanwhile under what is, with fine irony, known as the modus vivendi, English naval officers are pulling up the nets and traps of English fishermen, and have even destroyed British lobster factories in deference to the representations of the French. That an utterly indefensible wrong is being done by our own authorities to our own fellow-subjects seems to be beyond dispute. The difficulty is that Newfoundland counts for so little in international relations, and it is not worth while to be in earnest with France, who has Egypt to quote against us, for the sake of a handful of fisher-folk on the bare cliffs of a North Atlantic island.*

To a stranger, probably it will seem that the greatest political danger of the colony lies in its relations with a single man. The millionaire contractor—Mr. R. G. Reid—is practically buying Newfoundland and the Newfoundlanders. All public works—railways, tram-lines, dry-dock, waterworks—are swiftly concentrating themselves in his single hands. He is owner of half the soil opened up by the 550 miles of railroad; and in a land where so many politicians have their price, and great wealth is unknown outside his single ownership, it is obvious that the commonwealth is in great peril of suffering mischief from such a connection. At the same time it is doubtful whether the country would ever have been developed apart from Mr. Reid's energetic agency.

The opening up of the interior is the problem of the future. That there is considerable mineral wealth is certain; though how far it will pay for working opinions differ. There are spots where gold, silver, copper, iron, and other metals all lie together, yet none of these in remunerative quantities. A second Belle Isle is not likely to be discovered. There the iron ore actually lies immediately under the loose soil, and only needs to be carted and shipped without any mining proper whatsoever. This is being diligently worked. There are those who think that there is boundless promise for lumbering and farming in the almost unexplored interior. At this moment a Finnish agent is prospecting the country under the auspices of the Governor, in the hope that it may offer a refuge to some of his persecuted countrymen. Having visited both Newfoundland and Finland I can bear witness to their striking similarity—lake and pine-forest covering almost the whole area of either land. If the Finnish emigrant cares to feel at home in the New World, assuredly Terra Nova will have attractions for him above the wide wheat-fields of Canada or the States. R. A. ARMSTRONG.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Illingworth's "Divine Immanence."

WHEN we pass to the Renaissance and the Reformation with their multitude of writers selective quotation from the mass of material becomes almost impossible. Men returned to the study of Nature at first hand in every department of life, philosophers, poets, preachers, artists, all alike; and though of course the effect on some was renewed materialism, countless others recognised the spirituality of matter.

In literature we find Petrarch, who is the first to show the modern sense of scenery, and whose letters are full of the love of it, speaking of the spiritual thoughts which it inspires:—"This little spot under the rocks, in the midst of the waters, is more suited than any other to inspire profound thoughts by which the most idle minds may feel themselves lifted to lofty contemplation. . . . How often has night found me still wandering in the fields! How often have I risen in the silence of a summer night to offer up my prayers and midnight orisons to Christ, and then to steal forth alone . . . to wander by the light of the moon over the fields and mountains!"

While the same note is continually struck by the great painters, who in those delicate backgrounds, which were the first beginnings of all our modern landscape art, delight to associate the aspects of Nature, its smiling pastures, and its storm-rent rocks, with all the varying phases of spiritual life.

Protestant theology stands in sharp contrast with the other movements of the Renaissance. It is the more instructive, therefore, to notice that in this point they are at one. Here is a passage from the German mystic, Suso:—"Oh, how cloudlessly and cheerfully the beautiful sun rises in the summer season, and how diligently it gives growth and blessings to the soil; how the leaves and the grass come forth; how the beautiful flowers smile; how the forest, and the heath, and the meadows resound with the sweet songs of the nightingale and other small birds; how all the animals which were shut up during the hard winter come forth and enjoy themselves and go in pairs; how, in humanity, young and old manifest their joy in merry and gladsome utterances! O tender God! if Thou art so loving in Thy creatures, how fair and lovely must Thou be in Thyself!" Look further, I pray you, and behold the four elements—earth, water, air, and fire—and all the wonderful things in them; the variety and diversity of men, beasts, birds, fishes, and the wonders of the deep, all of which cry aloud and proclaim the praise and honour of the boundless and infinite nature of God! O Lord, who preserves all this? Who feeds it? Thou takest care of all, each in its own way, great and small, rich and poor. Thou, God! Thou doest it! Thou, God, art indeed God!"

Luther, again, was notorious for his religious love of Nature. But it is not so well known that Zwingli felt the same:—"From God," he says, "as from a fountain, and if I may use the expression, a first material, all things arise into being. By God's power all things exist, live, and operate; even in Him who is everywhere present; and after His pattern who is the essence, the existence, the life of the universe. Nor is man alone of divine origin; but all creatures, though some are nobler and more august than others. Yet all alike are from God and in God, and in proportion to their nobility they express more of the divine power and glory."

Catholic theology, again, is fundamentally opposed on many points to Protestant. Yet here they too are agreed. The following from Fénelon is thoroughly typical of the great Catholic writers of the seventeenth century. But it might almost be mistaken for a continuation of the above:—"I see God in everything; or, rather, I see everything in God. . . . All that exists, exists only by the communication of God's infinite being. All that has intelligence, has it only by derivation from His sovereign reason, and all that acts, acts only from the impulse of His supreme activity. It is He who does all in all; it is He who, at each instant of our life, is the beating of our heart, the movement of our limbs, the light of our eyes, the intelligence of our spirit, the soul of our soul. All that is in us, life, action, thought, will, is the product of His eternal power and life, and thought, and will."

OBITUARY.

MRS. MACE OF TENTERDEN.

IN the fulness of a ripe and honoured old age, with her mental powers unclouded, and her interest in all things keen and living to the end, there has passed from among us one who for the greater portion of a century has been connected with the ancient chapel at Tenterden. Elizabeth Grisbrook was born Dec. 4, 1809. Her father, Joseph Grisbrook, died in 1834, her mother in 1853. One of her brothers took a leading position in the town and congregation fifty years ago, and her other brother in that of Woolwich. On Oct. 17, 1843, she was married to John Ellis Mace, the eldest son of John Mace. Among the names of her more immediate ancestors were those of Knollys, Munn, Samson and Russell, and she was united by birth and marriage to many other families whose story makes up a large portion of the history of Tenterden. The widow of a man highly respected as a doctor, but still more highly respected as one of the main supporters of our cause, and the mother of him whose name, in our denominational assemblies, has almost come to be regarded as synonymous with Tenterden itself, her loss to the congregation of the old chapel means the snapping of more ties than any outsider can well understand. They lose in her an embodiment of steadfast purity of thought and deed, of calm insistence upon things that make for peace, without loss of principle or deflection from the ideals of a holy life, and of reliance upon the faith for which we stand, which were the admiration of all who knew her, and of the greatest assistance to all who came within her influence. Quiet and unassuming to a very marked degree, her very presence in the house of prayer, continued to the last Sunday of her mortal life, seemed to knit together past and present, and to be a gracious embodiment of the history of that religious society with which she was throughout her long life connected. On Aug. 25 her summons came, and she was laid to rest on Monday last in the little graveyard of the chapel, in the same vault with her husband, the funeral being attended by a large assembly of her relations and friends, among those nearest being representatives of the families of Briggs, Chitty, Howard, Mace, Sands, Shoobridge, and Vance-smith.

MRS. DAVID HEALEY.

THE congregation of the Britain Hill Church, at Heywood, have suffered a sad loss in the death of Mrs. David Healey, which took place at Dunoon on Wednesday, August 16, in her forty-fourth year. Mrs. Healey was the youngest daughter of Mr. Councillor Firth, J.P., formerly Mayor of Heywood, and had recently celebrated with her husband the twentieth anniversary of their marriage. The daughter of a veteran worker among the Unitarians of Heywood she was herself devoted to their cause, and took a special interest in the children of the Sunday-school. She and her husband recently gave a beautiful window to the church in memory of her mother.

* Since writing the above, I have seen Sir William Des Voeux's excellent article in the Nineteenth Century for August. It gives a full and most instructive account of the French Foreshore question.—R. A. A.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THIS is our last day of holidays, and we want to have it a very good and happy one.

Now, Touring Club, form yourselves into a committee, and I will it and write down your suggestions, and surely so many wise young heads will be able to hit on the very best scheme possible.

Ladies first, please; so, Miss Brownie-Curls, will you kindly favour us with your view? Oh! that is it. "Somewhere very, very beautiful and not too far." Now, Master Willie, you, I can see, are anxious to air your opinion; what have you to say? "Somewhere where it is very steep and hard to get, and you have to be tied together with ropes, and when you get there, there's foxes and rabbits, and a place to play cricket in, and nuts and raspberries, and mushrooms, and a pool to bathe in." Here a babel of voices breaks in, each eager to be heard, and we have some little confusion, so that I only pick up scraps of something like this:—"In a great big wood, full of lovely flowers." "Way up in the Happy Valley where our beck comes from." "Somewhere new, where we have never been before." "Let's go exploring and stay out till late, and walk home by moonlight." "Please may we go on the lake?" Bravo! the last speaker has settled it, for we have not been on the water yet, and what a pity it would be to go away without one day's boating. Fancy coming to lake-land and never once being afloat!

Accordingly it does not take many minutes for us to be marching once again through our straggling village, making our way as rapidly as may be to the little bay where our boat is moored. We have nearly three miles to walk, but we are all so happy and friendly, and the road and lanes are so beautiful and interesting, with glorious views of valley and mountain, that the time passes very quickly indeed. There is a most delightful grassy road, overhung with tall trees, or fringed with shrubs, and here the shining waters of Windermere are so near and are so desperately enticing, that we notice our little army involuntarily quickens its march, and sundry smiling young faces turn appealingly to the guide.

Well, I think I know what you want. "Off you go," and in a moment there is a glad, shouting, laughing crowd, hurrying mell-mell to the water's edge.

There is the Marion floating alongside the wooden landing, and though she is supposed to carry only eight passengers at most, we can get over that difficulty, for there is an old Fairy friend of all children, good-natured "Mrs. Make-Believe," whom we have all played with, and by her aid the Marion will carry every one of us quite safely. Close by is a funny little boathouse, built of stone, and a great strong door to it, studded over with big nails. It has a chimney at one end, and I have not quite decided whether it more resembles a dwarf's castle or a giant's money-box. Anyhow, let us open the door, take out the oars, and rudder, and anchor, and some cushions, and then we shall be quite ready to start.

Most of you well know that Windermere is a very large lake, about eleven miles long, and in parts nearly one mile wide. We are going to row about six miles, for now that we are fairly afloat I have a little secret to tell you. Some young friends of ours are "camping out" by the margin of the lake, and we are invited to go and give them a call, and have tea.

They are living in a tent, and promise us a hearty welcome; but they warn us we must not expect too much in the way of cups and saucers and knives and forks and spoons.

Well, children, I, for one, think the very nicest picnics are those where there is only one knife among three of you, and you have to borrow a spoon, and there are hardly any saucers, and if by good luck there is no handle to your cup, what a particularly mirthful party you may have!

All this time we are rowing quietly but steadily towards our destination, the wavelets dancing about our boat as she ripples through the clear water. Now and again we come into shallows, and can see tall bright green water weeds rising, or a shorter, grasslike growth carpeting the lake.

Here we see a shoal of minnows glancing brightly, and here, if you will look carefully, you may see a number of perch swimming slowly about, where the water is some six or eight feet deep.

Onward goes our boat with its happy freight—on each side such a fair landscape to gaze upon, so full of quiet, restful beauty, that we too are quiet and rested, till a new vision calls out new expressions of delight and wonder. Ah me! dear children, if I could only describe to you the beauties I have seen in earth and sky and wave in this enchanted lakeland.

We are quite half way by this time, and are passing beautiful Bowness Bay, with its scores of pleasure boats, its trim yachts, and please don't fail to notice the swans waiting about the pier to be fed. We must hurry on, passing Ferry Nab, where the lake is at its narrowest, and we see the lumbering ferry-boat struggling across with its cargo of vehicles and people.

Now, little "Sharp Eyes," what do you see in yon wood a few feet from the water's edge? A tent, is it? Then, hurrah! for our journey is almost over; pull rowers, pull hard and strong, and run our boat high up on the gravel beach.

Our kind friends wave a greeting to us, and then rush down to join us, and very soon we are introduced to the wonders of "Tent Villa," and begin to feel very much like junior Robinson Crusoes.

Outside the tent a hammock is slung, and near to is a splendid swing, fastened to a great oak that stretches out a long arm as though in invitation.

Come and inspect the "kitchen," which consists solely of a fireplace made of rough stones, while above it swings a kettle, gipsy fashion. All about us are trees, big and little, bushes, and underwood, and everywhere it is dry and clean.

Here our party splits, some go roaming for flowers and nuts, some swarm trees, some fish in the lake, some take the boat and row off for water lilies, and some—the industrious ones—not H. V. C.) get tea ready.

Tea, indeed! I guessed how it would be—the merriest, noisiest, happiest little family that can be; short of cups, short of knives and spoons, the milk given out, the butter in short supply, everything to make it jolly and picnicky.

We are afloat once again; a ringing cheer for our late hosts, and then we are "homeward bound." The glowing sun sets, the hills are purple, then dusky; the shadows fall and deepen; but we know no fear, and as the moon rises and silvers our path, we join hands and sing to the Giver of all Good our evening hymn.

IRISH CONGREGATIONS.

SIR,—I am sure Mr. Worthington will accept my correction of a passage dealing specially with York-street congregation in his exceedingly interesting article on "Irish Congregations." The passage reads, "In this church (York-street) as in the others at Belfast service is held both morning and evening, although sometimes evening services are suspended in the summer months." The correction is that York-street is the one, and only one of our congregations in Belfast which has never suspended evening services during the summer months. The attendance is small, but I do not see my way to a discontinuance of the summer Sunday evening services, though, as Mr. Worthington rightly remarks, "the situation of this church is in the business part of the town." Some who attend in the evening come the longest distances to that service and are right loyal to their Meeting-house and minister, and it is my clear duty to encourage them.

While writing may I also make a remark upon a passage in Mr. Worthington's article contrasting Irish with English Sunday-schools. I believe there is quite as much effort made in Irish as in English towns "to secure the attendance at the Sunday-school of children whose parents are not connected with religious institutions. From my own experience as an Englishman in England I am not aware that any very special efforts are made (by Unitarians at any rate) except by the domestic missions, to bring young street arabs under the influence of religion by means of the Sunday-school, and Belfast has also its "Domestic Mission to the poor" supported and managed practically by Unitarians.

I fear the selling of newspapers on Sunday is by no means confined to Belfast. It will be found, I fear, in most English towns of 100,000 people, and in many towns much smaller than that. The Sporting Chronicle is the offending paper, and I think I am right in stating it was originally printed in Manchester. I believe I am correct, too, in saying that at one time the Unitarian Herald was printed in the same office and by the same machinery as the Sporting Chronicle in a court behind Corporation-street. It would be interesting to know if the Sporting Chronicle office printed the Unitarian Herald for a time and if that was so were we giving countenance and support to a sporting paper by that transaction?

I need not say how much gratified we were to have a visit from an Englishman who appreciated the difficulties under which our work is carried on on this side of the Channel.

THE BIBLE FOR HOME READING.

THREE years ago Mr. MONTEFIORE issued the first volume of his "Bible for Home Reading," carrying down his selections and elucidations of the history and literature to the time of the second visit of NEHEMIAH to Jerusalem, and now the work is completed by the issue of a second volume,* covering the remaining three centuries of the history, from 430 B.C., the approximate date of NEHEMIAH's visit, to the death of SIMON, the Maccabean, in 135 B.C. Of this latter period there is no direct historical record in the Bible, but to it belongs a great part of what is most precious in the books of the Old Testament, which is, of course, the Bible with which Mr. MONTEFIORE deals. Thus the whole "Wisdom" literature is here dealt with, the Books of Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and the books of Ecclesiasticus and of the Wisdom of Solomon from the Apocrypha. And while the age of the great prophets was at an end, the literary editing of the prophets was still in process, and we have the Books of Amos and Hosea given entire, with the Editor's masterly elucidation, together with passages from Isaiah and the Book of Joel. Then the two religious tales, Esther and Jonah, form a section by themselves; and the supreme book of the Old Testament, the collection of the Psalms, belonging to this post-exilic period, occupies more than a quarter of Mr. MONTEFIORE's volume of nearly 800 pages. Finally, the history of the heroic Maccabean period is narrated, with full quotations from the first and second books of the Maccabees, together with the Book of Daniel, the whole of which is given.

While naturally retaining the same title for the second as for the first part of his work, Mr. MONTEFIORE explains in the Preface to his new volume that he has not attempted to make it suitable for very youthful readers, since the books dealt with "demand comments and reflections hardly fitted for boys and girls under sixteen." It is, in fact, not a book for children, but for educated readers of maturer age, who desire help for an intelligent study of the Bible in the light of present-day knowledge and in the spirit of reverent religious freedom. For such a purpose the book seems to us altogether admirable, and we are confident that it will receive a very cordial welcome far beyond the circle of the Jewish families for which it is primarily intended. Mr. MONTEFIORE is known as a reverent and sympathetic student of Christian literature, and we have already had occasion gratefully to acknowledge the power he has shown in his Hibbert Lectures of interpreting with true and helpful insight the sacred literature of his own people for those who have different religious associations. We earnestly commend his new volume to the attention of our teachers and to our people, young and old alike, who would be thankful for fresh light upon the treasures of wisdom and religious inspiration contained in the Old Testament and the Apocrypha.

The tone of Mr. MONTEFIORE's criticism may be gathered from the following passage in his introduction to the Book of Proverbs:—

Calm and measured reflection seems the source of the Proverbs. There is an absence of fervour, of abandon, of enthusiasm. Their authors seem to stand a bit aloof from conflict and passion as well as from spiritual ardours and aspiration. This, again, is partly due to the necessities of the proverbial manner. Spiritual realities cannot be grasped by the intellect alone; feeling in its highest form is needed for their right apprehension, and this feeling must run over into the words that describe them. But an emotional proverb is almost a contradiction in terms. It is here that proverbial literature falls short. A purely intellectual conception of spiritual truth does not vitally touch us. It does not seem to unlock the deeper secrets; its key does not fit the most delicate wards of our nature; its answers do not satisfy our finer needs. The Book of Proverbs is at its best when it is least proverbial.

And as we pass on to Mr. MONTEFIORE's elucidation of the Book of Job and the Psalms we are more and more impressed by the fine religious nature which brings the wealth of ancient philosopher and modern poet into touch with the sacred literature, and with no affectation of learning gets to the very heart of the writer's meaning. To throw further light on the great problem dealt with in the Book of Job there are helpful quotations from PLATO, BROWNING and JOWETT, and the chapter ends with the lines from MILTON:—

All is best, though oft we doubt
What the unsearchable dispose Of highest wisdom brings about,
And ever best found in the close.

Of the 150 Psalms about 120 are dealt with in this volume, divided into sections according to their general subject, and in the commentary other interesting versions are occasionally given. Thus of the Twenty-third Psalm we find the versions from the Vulgate, WICLIF, three of the early English Bibles, and the Scottish metrical version. Of the Ninetieth Psalm WATTS's well-known rendering, "O God, our help in ages past," is given, and Mr. MONTEFIORE adds: "I wish this beautiful hymn were sung in our synagogues."

In a final chapter Mr. MONTEFIORE sums up the conclusions arrived at from his study of the Bible. Its great lessons, he says, are of goodness and of God; but such teaching cannot be confined to the limits of a single people. "A God who is one and universal must be worshipped with rites in which all men may join." Whereas now already the Jews belong to many nations of the earth, the time must come when their religion in its essence shall be the possession of many races, with rites that have assumed a purely universal shape.

Even now there is much which is common to ourselves and to many forms and varieties of Christianity, the dominant religion of Europe and of all European colonies and offshoots. And the more our own religion keeps true and draws near to the best spirit and highest teaching of the prophets, and the more Christianity on the other hand keeps true and draws near to the teaching of its founder, the greater this common element becomes. In their fundamental essentials the religions of liberal thinkers and of good men in every creed are gradually approximating more nearly to one another, even though this approximation is often unperceived by themselves. And the result, we may make bold to say, seems all in the direction of a universalised Judaism, under whatever name it may be called. The most intimate relation between religion on the one hand and morality and truth on the other, the worship of one God who is Himself the source of goodness and of truth—such seem to be essential features of the faith to which we may look forward as the common possession of civilised man.

Towards this end the Bible of Judaism, which is a great part also of the Christian Bible, has made and continues to make contributions of immeasurable worth. It enunciates religious principles which are "great, comprehensive, and adaptable."

But are we to suppose that there could or can be no religious development, no fresh contribution to religious and ethical teaching beyond what is contained in these Hebrew scriptures? Such an idea, it seems to me, would be very erroneous. No human product is or can be perfect or complete, and the Hebrew scriptures, though touched by the spirit of God, are yet, like every other book, the work of man. We worship God only; we do not worship a book. One only is perfect; nor could God Himself endow any of His creatures with the perfection which is His alone. In morals and religion there can be no finality, no absolute attainment. Such seems to be the conclusion we may draw from human nature and from history. You can indeed say of certain broad and general principles, as of certain formal laws, that they are permanent and incapable of improvement, but the application of those principles and laws, their better formulation, the fuller perception of their drift and many-sided implications, their relation to changing circumstance—all this involves endless progress and development. "God is one." "There is one God." "Love God." "Love man." "Be good." "Do good." Statements and injunctions such as these can scarcely be susceptible of improvement or change. But happily there can hardly be a limit to our better and fuller comprehension of what perfect goodness implies, of what the nature of the divine rule seems to be, and how we best can "love" God and man.

* "The Bible for Home Reading," edited, with comments and reflections for the use of Jewish parents and children, by C. G. Montefiore. Second Part. Macmillan and Co. 5s. 6d.

And so Mr. MONTEFIORE points to what may be learnt from the great teachers of other religions, such as MOHAMMED and BUDDHA, from moralists and philosophers such as SOCRATES and PLATO, and from the later Jewish wisdom which is found in the Talmud and is no mere repetition of of Biblical teaching, but contains a distinct development of further spiritual insight. Then as to the Christian literature of the New Testament, there is frank acknowledgment of the new elements of religious truth it contains, or the completer developments of old truth, while it is pointed out how these are blended with elements which to the Jewish mind are false or liable to dangerous perversion, imperilling the integrity of fundamental truths as to the unity of God, and the immediate relations between the human child and the divine FATHER. We are glad to note Mr. MONTEFIORE's expression of a hope that he may be able at some future time to issue an edition of the New Testament for Jewish readers, in which he will aim at distinguishing between those different elements, for even though we should not be able to accept all his conclusions, we should be confident that he would give us a luminous and reverent treatment of a great subject, and in such a spirit as would surely make for the progress of religious truth. Meanwhile, we accept with sincerest admiration and gratitude the gift of this earlier work now happily completed.

THOUGHTS FROM ITALY.

IV.—A GOTHIC CHAPEL.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.,
MINISTER OF ALL SOULS' CHURCH, BELFAST.

"I prayed, and understanding was given me: I called upon God, and the spirit of wisdom came to me. And I preferred her before sceptres and thrones."—Wisdom vii. 7f.

As we might expect from the aims of the two orders and the characters of their founders, Franciscanism was more popular than Dominicanism; but in Florence the latter was particularly strong and included some very celebrated men. For example, the Dominican convent of St. Mark, of which I shall speak next Sunday, was the home of Fra Angelico and Savonarola and their respective friends St. Antonino and Fra Bartolomeo. And though the great Dominican doctor, Thomas Aquinas, was not a Florentine, his scheme of thought is presented and his memory is honoured, as perhaps nowhere else, on the walls of the chapter-house of Sta. Maria Novella.

St. Francis was the apostle of love—"seraphic in fervour," as Dante describes him; St. Dominic was the apostle of truth—in the phrase of Dante, "a splendour of cherubic light"; and as St. Francis married Poverty, St. Dominic wedded Faith. Both fought with the old enemy of the Church—Paganism: St. Francis against its selfishness, St. Dominic against its unbelief. "The army of Christ," says Dante, "was moving slow, mistrustful, and scattered behind the banner of the Cross, when St. Dominic was raised up to rally the stragglers." He was a Spaniard, born in 1170, rather more than ten years before St. Francis, of a noble and wealthy family. He grew up an earnest, vigorous scholar, deeply religious, a lover of the people, and a hater of the indifference, cynicism, and feeble indefiniteness of the teaching of the time. Once, when a student, he sold his precious books to help the hungry. On another occasion he offered himself as a ransom for a slave. To assist the poor in the remembrance and repetition of their prayers, he invented the rosary. He cared for truth because he cared for human lives. The people, he said, were perishing for the truth of God. They must have it. The Gospel could not be a matter of speculation for courtiers and ecclesiastics, a subject for after-dinner discussion. It must be planted a living thing in the people's hearts. A lazy priesthood was no cure for either the apathy or the honest errors of the world. In France the Church was putting down heresy by brow-beating and massacre. Dominic declared it was wrong. Zeal must be met by zeal, lowliness by lowliness, superstition by real sanctity, and the preaching of falsehood by the preaching of truth. So he started the "Preaching Friars"—not "patres," as the priests were called, but "fratres"—who instead of retiring to monasteries or conducting mumbling services in Latin,* should go forth among the people and preach, proclaiming to them, in their native tongue, the imperishable truths of God and Christ and Immortality, and should depend for their living on the people's charity.

They arrived in Florence in 1220, eight years after the Franciscans, and quickly gathered the multitude; and in 1279, when they had collected money enough to begin, they commenced their great church of Sta. Maria Novella, with a nave like that of Santa Croce for a vast audience. This was the church, you will remember, for which Cimabue, an old pupil of the Dominican school, painted his famous Madonna. When the new cloister was added, Giotto, or one of his pupils, painted some Bible stories on its wall; and after the chapter-house was finished, which was about the time of Giotto's death (1337), two of his pupils covered the whole of the interior with pictures representing the doctrine and work of the Dominican order.

Giotto left behind him a large number of scholars, who were named the "Giottoists." In his spirit they painted in the churches for the instruction of the worshippers. They confined themselves to religious themes and to the original intention of teaching the faith. When, therefore, Taddeo Gaddi, the pupil of Giotto who continued his Bell-Tower and built the Ponte Vecchio (in 1334), and Simone Memmi, another pupil and a better painter than Taddeo Gaddi (a friend, by the way, of Petrarch), were commissioned to paint the chapter-house of St. Mary's, they kept in view that the elders of the monastery would sit round its walls and deliberate. The subject, given to them by the Superior, was a special one demanding special treatment. It must appeal to educated men, to men who were the best educationalists of the day and the revivers of the intellectual life of the mediæval universities. We enter expecting to use our brains; and I hope you will not think me dry if I ask you to use yours. Mr. Ruskin tells us that he spent five weeks here studying part of one picture. I warn you, then, that the study of this Gothic chapel is not a mere recreation.

The building is about 60ft. by 30ft., twice as broad as it is long, with a tall vaulted roof and no central pillar. Its four walls and the four pointed compartments of the ceilings are covered with frescoes.

As you enter, the highest truths of Christianity, as conceived by the Dominican, look down upon you from the ceiling—as, indeed, they look down upon you daily from the vault of God's heaven. In front is the Resurrection, telling you, as the first thing you ought to know, that you have a soul—that you will not perish with the beasts of the field, that some divine meaning runs through the universe which will be unfolded by and by, and that your life will be rewarded or punished according to its merits. Then behind you is the Ascension. It speaks of the passing of Jesus to regions higher than the earth and nearer to God. "Jesus," it says, "has risen, and you too will rise if you follow him; you also shall tread death and hell under your feet." Next, left and right, are the Descent of the Spirit, and the Presence of Christ in His Church. They tell us that the Holy Ghost comes down to the world and enters into men's hearts, and that a Providential goodness governs human affairs.

If we keep these four cardinal facts in our mind, as depicted in the ceiling by Taddeo Gaddi, we shall be able to understand what is further told us in the paintings by Simone Memmi on the walls below. On the wall opposite, beneath the Resurrection, are the historical events immediately preceding and following it—namely, the procession to Calvary, the Crucifixion, and the Descent of Jesus into Hades. At your back, below the Ascension, are scenes in the lives of Dominican saints who are preparing for Heaven. Then left and right are Memmi's masterpieces, giving the whole theory of Dominican doctrine and its practical application in the world, to which I now invite your attention.

Let us take the left one first, with its Survey of Dominican Doctrine.

Above it, remember, in the ceiling, is the Descent of the Spirit, in the form of a dove, upon the Virgin and the twelve apostles in the upper chamber at Jerusalem, and thence upon men of different nations in the street below. Also receiving this divine influence, and the embodiment of it in its latest form, sits in the centre of Memmi's picture the great Dominican, St. Thomas Aquinas. Over his head are angels; on each side of him are the Biblical theologians; at his feet are the arch-heretics; while underneath his throne is a row of maidens representing the secular and theological sciences, with, again at their feet, scholars who have excelled in these several sciences, both among the heathen and in Christendom.

Thomas Aquinas, who was, living in Dante's boyhood, and died about the time Giotto was born, and was canonised in the year 1323, two years after Dante's death,* and not long, therefore, before Simone Memmi's picture, was the greatest theological writer of his age, and author of a famous treatise the "Summa Theologiae." In this "Sum of Theology" the wisdom of the Bible writers, who sit on his right and left—Moses, Job, David, Solomon, Isaiah, the Evangelists, and St. Paul—was considered to be summed up and perfected. He was called the "Angelic Doctor," partly because of his insight into the spiritual world and partly because of the serenity and sweetness of his disposition. Dante, who says of St. Dominic that he was benignant to friends but harsh to foes, recognises the gentleness of Thomas Aquinas by making him the eulogist of St. Francis in the "Paradiso." Aquinas, it is stated, never lost his temper in dispute; and his critics called him, on account of his broad, heavy face and stolid good-nature, "the Ox." There was nothing of the persecutor about him. Nor, indeed, was Dominicanism regarded as a persecuting force in those days of bloodshed and tyranny in many parts of Europe. On the contrary, it had merciful associations. A young penitent, the story goes, once sought shelter in a storm. He knocked at a door, but heard a voice from within say, "I am Justice: this place is not for you." He went to another and knocked, and he heard a voice say, "I am Truth: the false may not enter." He tried a third, and a voice said, "I am Peace: there is no peace for the wicked." At last he tried one where he heard the words, "I am Mercy: come in"; and entering, he found there a Dominican.

So we are not surprised to see above St. Thomas Aquinas, in the picture, the figures of Love and her sisters Hope and Faith, with those of their cousins Temperance, Prudence, Justice, and Fortitude; and at his footstool, subdued, not by chains but by the gentle force of truth, the arch-heretics Arius, Sabellius, and Averroes.

There is much here already to set us thinking. Is it not remarkable to find Aquinas enthroned among the inspired? The Divine Spirit, according to this Dominican teaching, was not limited to the men of Scripture nor to Palestine. Revelation was not closed.* "It is here," said the men of Florence, "in our own age and in our own great ones; God loves us and speaks to us, and we are His." This is the conviction which made Florence great, which built her cathedral and other splendid churches, and her Bell Tower, and produced her carvings and bronzes and paintings, and the "Divine Comedy" and the "Summa Theologiae." And I believe, my friends, that without this faith noble and beautiful cities cannot be; and that so long as we go on doing as we do, selfishly, each for himself or for his own sect and party only, without the true spirit of worship, believing in no living voice to ourselves, trusting in money, and terribly afraid of pain and death, our cities will be as they are—cheerless, often hideous, unrestful, exciting no joy in the poor, and giving to the rich only material comfort and luxury.

And is it not remarkable, too, to find Love and her attendants above the head of Wisdom? In the hands of Aquinas is a book open to you to read, with the words in Latin—"I prayed, and understanding was given me: I called upon God, and the Spirit of Wisdom came to me. And I preferred her before sceptres and thrones." There must be the desire to know, expressing itself in toilsome labour and prayer to the Giver of all knowledge. But first of all there must be love. Without it science and culture and the Bible are worth nothing. What shall we gather from philosophy, or psalm or prophecy or gospel, unless love and the kindred virtues are already in our hearts? So I understand this Dominican teaching. Without love, letters will be dead things, even those of Holy Writ.

Fourteen maidens, sitting as in the stalls of a chapter-house, symbolise the Sciences; and below them are the best representatives of these Sciences in the heathen and Christian ages.

First are the seven Secular Sciences—Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, Music, Astronomy, Geometry, and Arithmetic; or, in more familiar language, Reading and Writing, Good Speaking, Reasoning, Singing and Playing on musical instruments, the Study of the Stars, and the Measuring and Counting of objects on the earth. Grammar teaches three children, a girl and two boys, and points them to the narrow gate of discipline, which is the entrance to learning. As a starting-point they must learn their letters, to read and to write them. Then they must learn to speak—that is, to open their mouths and utter intelligibly and persuasively what they have to say. And by persuasively, the painter means calmly and thoughtfully, without noise or gesticulation; for he sets

Truth above the head of Rhetoric, and beneath her Cicero resting his chin quietly upon his hand. Speech of this kind helps Reason, which should be both the outcome and the source of eloquence. The tongue's chief use is to assist the brain.

Next comes the use of the voice and the ear. Every person who would be educated, says the old Florentine, must sing, or at least produce beautiful sounds on a musical instrument. The world was made to sing in, not for gloom and sourness. Right reason should make us all singers—provided, adds Mr. Ruskin, we have passed through the strait-gate. Without that gate there is no true song.

Then we must learn to use our eyes. We must lift them up to the heavens. In those days there was no knowing the time or season without study of the sun and stars.* It is still spiritually true. We cannot live with our faces and thoughts to the ground. We must see where we are, what is over our heads, within what mighty forces we live, what unspeakable Powers govern us, and realise that we are not our own, but belong to immensities we cannot fathom.

After that, to some effect, we may look on the earth. Study now some geometry and arithmetic. Geometry is older than Euclid. In the Bible there is a famous geometrical proposition which says: "Cursed is he that moves his neighbour's landmark." Ignorance of that proposition has brought infinite trouble, and threatens now to destroy civilisation. All over the world we must study landmarks. The boundaries of nations and the limits of property are a very vital concern to all true scholars. Arithmetic, too, is very ancient. "Two and two make four, not five." The usurer, as Mr. Ruskin reminds us, maintains that they make five, and most people who have a little money to invest try to think so too. I have a conviction, which grows stronger, that this defiance of arithmetic is not unconnected with that above of geometry. I do not believe that labour would give five for four unless its landmarks had been long ago obliterated. But whether this is so or not, I want you to keep in mind that there are twenty shillings in a pound, not twenty-one; that an income of £100 is not £120; that a day has only twenty-four hours, and a year but twelve months; and that we have only some three score years and ten at the best to do our life's work in. So, my friends, while we live beneath the infinite heavens, we must count our pennies and minutes.

Next come the Sciences Theological—Civil Law, Canon Law, and Practical, Devotional, Dogmatic, Mystical, and Polemical Theology. The Christian must know something of these. Do not be alarmed, my friends. They are not so formidable as they sound. Putting away the scholastic terms we shall find them, I think, very simple and necessary.

Every Christian should know something of Civil Law, which, please notice, is regarded here as a part of theology and religion. It is the science of citizenship, the science which, as a part of theology and religion, made Florence glorious. We must study the public welfare. We must preserve public rights, and co-operate for the good of the community. The Christian citizen understands social justice and seeks to embody it in the laws, taxes, and institutions of his country. If a man or woman thinks that this is not his business, and that he may leave it to others, he is five hundred years behind the time. The old Florentines will call him a barbarian, even though he ride a bicycle or talk through a telephone.

* Whence he is not St. Thomas in the "Divine Comedy."

* I read the following note at the end of a Bible of a Belfast Protestant:—"God has not spoken since this book of Revelation was written, the longest silence since the creation." What sort of a city will grow up on such a Protestantism?

* The least educated of Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims knew more of the sun and stars than the great majority of modern graduates do now.

Then, following, you observe, the science of citizenship, are the sciences of churchmanship. I hope we all know a little about them. There is the science of the relation of the Church to the State, and of being true to the church we think it our duty to support. There is the science of being a practical Christian—of doing to our neighbour, whatever his creed, what we would have him do to us. There is the science of private inquiry and reflection in religion, which is very necessary if we are to have a faith of our own, and not merely a belief borrowed from others. True faith can only come through wrestling and devotion. And through these, I understand the Florentines to say, we shall reach some fixed, unalterable truth or dogma which shall serve as a foundation for higher mysteries. Lastly, as good Christians we must be eager to proclaim what we have found. We must make war, in the spirit of love, on the wretched falsehoods which darken and weaken men's lives. This is polemical theology, the crowning science of Christian manhood, which changes us from mere learners and disciples into teachers and apostles.

You will pardon me, I hope, for dwelling so long on this painting, when I tell you that this is the one on a part of which Mr. Ruskin spent five weeks. Let us now turn to the picture on the right of the chapel, concluding the series.

It represents the world, under Providential Government, as the field for Dominican apostleship. Wisdom, just elucidated, is here put into practice in Church and State.

In one corner is Arnolfo's Cathedral, with Giotto's Tower. In front of it, side by side, sit Pope and Emperor, Christ's delegates on earth; one holding his pastoral staff as head of the spiritual realm, the other a drawn sword as the head of things temporal. Students of Dante will at once recognise the conception.* It is the relation of Church and State held by the best thinkers of the time. Dante attributed the ills of humanity in a large measure to conflict between the divinely appointed governors of the world, the Pope and the Emperor, or to one or other failing in his duty. On the Pope's right, therefore, are the ecclesiastical authorities under him, from cardinal and bishop to monk and nun and friar. On the Emperor's left is a corresponding group of the laity, including king, baron, knight, lawyer, architect, poet, painter, and the dependants of feudalism down to the cripple and the beggar.

In the opposite corner is the Garden of Worldly Folly. We see lordly pleasure-houses, orchards whose fruit turns to ashes in the mouth of greedy youth, the pomp and vanity of middle age, the seven deadly sins, and the unbelief and imposture of heretics. Into this garden the Dominicans go forth to seek and save. They plead with the foolish, soften the hearts of the selfish, convince infidels; and, as faithful Dogs of the Lord (Domini canes), they hunt the worst destroyers, the devouring wolves of devilish falsehood, bringing back the poor wounded sheep to the fold.

And above are penitents, who turning to the Saviour, and delivered of their sins, become again as little children, and enter the kingdom of Heaven. There angels meet them with chaplets of flowers, and welcome them to Paradise, the home of the blessed, of prophets, apostles, saints, and martyrs, and thronging multitudes of the redeemed, who draw nearer, as they grow more perfect, to the throne of God, and sing in deeper harmony.

I have not time to speak of the admirable drawing and rich colouring and picturesque grouping of these paintings. They show that Simone Memmi had a better knowledge of the technique of his art than Giotto. But I hope you feel that there is an idea, infinitely true to the artist, underlying all his draughtsmanship and composition, and exalting them: Memmi was a man who felt, above all, the sacredness of the subject he was handling, and used his whole skill to make others feel it. Whether we agree with him on questions of doctrine matters little. The important point is that he shaped grandly what was true to him and to his time.

And here, I think, we have the condition of great art in the future. When we have great art again, it will not be imitative; it will not go to the past for its inspiration; it will not be sentimental nor merely decorative. It will be original, inventive, modern, and religious. Great art will come once more when religion, by its obvious truth and kindling enthusiasm, seizes upon all classes, sects, and parties, and unites them, as Medieval Catholicism united them in Florence, and by the power of its universality impels genius to give it beautiful and glorious outward form.

We want an entirely new Protestantism, a Protestantism which shall not bark at ancient beliefs, nor perpetuate old controversies,* but shall embody all that is good in venerable creeds, and at the same time shall enlist the best knowledge of the age. It must be a faith so simple and grand that it shall be dear to all religious people, declaring the everlasting truths that God is our Father and all men are brothers, and taking therefore as its chief end the eradication of the injustices and paganisms of modern life. Its gospel must be one which we may believe with a good conscience and something more, which we may embrace with eager devotion, with a Jesus in it whom everyone can love—agnostics and atheists too—as the supreme leader of the race: supreme not in virtue of his supposed Godhead or miracles or aught else that is questionable, but in virtue of what is unquestionable—his pity, his justice, his sublime self-sacrifice, and the accumulated sanctity which during nineteen centuries has gathered about his name.

When we have such a Protestantism—and we shall have it, perhaps, sooner than many believe—we shall have also noble art; and in this city, it may be, we shall have "a vaulted book" as beautiful and inspiring to us as the chapter-house of Sta. Maria Novella was to the contemporaries of Giotto and Fra Angelico. And it will not be alone. The Protestantism that can build such a chapel and paint such pictures on its walls, will do ten thousand things besides.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.—III.

THE transition from Norman to Early English style, which took place in the latter part of the twelfth century, was a transition from mass to lightness, from a rude elaboration of ornament to simplicity and elegance. The square piers and massive round columns are succeeded by groups of light round columns. The heavy capitals and flat square-cut abacus (the flat stone on the top of the capital, from which the arch springs) are succeeded by light round capitals, the only ornament of which is a succession of simple mouldings, and a round moulded abacus; or these light round capitals are covered with foliage, technically called "stiff foliage," not because it is stiff and heavy, for it is of an extremely light and elegant description, but because the leaf springs from a stiff stalk against the lower part of the capital. Later the foliage becomes less strong and individual, and forms often a close wreath around the whole capital. The arches spring high and light with simple mouldings, the only ornament of which is their own natural light and shade. Into this is introduced a simple but very effective succession of little ornaments, all exactly the same, which form a line of moulding known as dog tooth. This is as definite and trustworthy an indication of this period as the zigzag, billet, chevron, or cable of the Norman style.

With this change in construction came a gradual change in the windows, which was destined to produce the most striking of all features of Gothic architecture. The Norman windows were all plain round-headed openings, without tracery of any kind. They are found in some parts still of various cathedrals and Norman churches; but in the east and west ends they have almost everywhere been replaced by later large and ornate windows. Even the little village churches, for the most part, have been thus altered and more brightly lighted. The east end of St. Peter's, Northampton, and of the little church at Darenth in Kent, and some others, are still lighted by the original Norman windows—small plain round-headed openings, each entirely separate from the others.

The characteristic Early English window is known as the "lancet window." It is tall, narrow, without tracery, and surmounted by a pointed arch. The west end of Ripon Cathedral is lighted by a succession of such windows covering the whole front. The east end of Ely has three such lancet lights side by side, and above them five smaller ones, and above these in the gable are five others; the east end of Hereford has three such lights deeply recessed from the inside with groups of slender columns, and a dog-tooth moulding in the arches. But the most famous of all these lancet windows are the "five sisters" of York, in the north transept; five equal lights placed closely side by side, yet each a separate window, rising almost from floor to roof.

The name "Early English" appears at

* The picture, or at any rate this corner of it, would make an admirable frontispiece to Mr. Wicksteed's translation of Dante's "De Monarchia."

* As "Unitarianism" necessarily does, first an unmeaning one to give to this period of architecture. The English were here before the Normans, and what we call Saxon architecture was really English. But the name has been given and will doubtless remain as a well-established term; and it has two justifications. First, it belongs to a time when the Norman conquerors and the English people had practically become fused in one, and that the English, nation. Secondly, one of its most marked features is seen in these grand yet simple groups of plain lancet windows; and these are rarely found at all, and never in their full perfection of development, except in England. "Nowhere on the Continent," says Ferguson, "are such combinations to be found as in the five sisters of York, the east end of Ely, or the east end of Hereford."

In large buildings these groups of lancet windows were sufficient and complete. There is no room or occasion in the north transept of York for anything more than the five tall windows side by side. The west front of Ripon, monotonous as it appears at first, as seen from without, clearly admits of no addition or elaboration. From within it is perfect in its lightness and simplicity. We are now so familiar with the elaborate tracery of later windows that this simpler early style may seem to some persons bald, and we may feel that there is in a sense something wanting that we miss. But it is not possible to imagine anything added that could make up for such deficiency, and after a time we realise the completeness and the beauty of this perfect simplicity.

But in the smaller churches, where instead of a group of lancet windows there were just two side by side, these, to give a sense of unity and completeness, were often united under one arch, and then in the upper part of this arch there was a blank space between the two smaller arches. This was distinctly offensive to the eye, and the simplest and most natural remedy was to cut an opening in it and let the light through and break the bare stone space. In some cases the whole of the large enclosing arch was filled by one stone, and in this were cut out the arches of the two windows, and the opening between, which was either circular, or quatre-foil, or formed by two segments of a circle meeting in two points in a vertical line. Now let the openings be enlarged and the stone between diminished, till it forms mere mullions below and dividing lines of stone work within the arch, which embraces the whole, and we have the beginning of what is known as "window tracery." The two arched windows and the opening between the arches all embraced in one including arch become one window divided by tracery, the lines and openings of which form a kind of simple pattern.

This window tracery, as it is called, was at first purely geometrical; every line was either a straight line, or a circle, or a segment of a circle. The window could be drawn with a ruler and compasses. But even with this limitation as to character it was capable of great elaboration and beauty. The great east window of Lincoln consists of eight lights all the same height and culminating in a line of eight pointed arches. These are grouped two and two together, and resting between the two arches in each case is a circle, and the two arches and circle are embraced in a larger arch rising higher. We thus get four larger arches, each containing two smaller ones with a circle between them. Then these four larger arches are grouped two and two in a precisely similar manner, with a larger circle between in each case, and again each pair embraced in a larger arch. This makes two groups of the whole, embraced in two arches. Between these two again is a circle, but now necessarily so large as to require some subdivision, and it is broken by a series of circles placed within it, and the pair of arches with the large circle containing its own subsidiary tracery is then embraced by the main arch of the whole window. The whole design is perfectly simple and comprehensible, and at the same time it is both impressive and restful. This geometrical tracery is capable of very varied detail and elaboration. It may be taken as the extreme development of Early English architectural design. The east window of Lincoln is the most perfect example of it.

The beauty of the Early English style consists in its lightness, its simplicity, and the perfect harmony of all its parts, and it is fortunate that we have one cathedral complete in this style without admixture either of earlier or later work; except in the spire, which is so distinct a feature that slightly more elaborate work in it hardly affects the general impression. It is the only style which we find in any cathedral complete and unbroken by any admixture of other styles and periods.

Salisbury Cathedral, with the exception of the spire, which is somewhat later, is pure Early English throughout. It is the only cathedral in England that is of one uniform design and style.

LESSONS.

WHAT is the lesson the flower preaches
As it blooms beside the brook?
Could we but listen to what it teaches,
We should need no written book.

Up from the bosom of earth it shoots
To drink the living air;
It opens its heart to the light and heat
And scatters its perfume rare.

"Open thy heart," the flower is saying,
"To heavenly truth and love;
To God, in man, be aye repaying
The good that he sends from above."

What is the lesson the streamlet preaches
As it leaps down the mountain-side,
Nor rests nor sleeps, but ever reaches
On to the ocean's tide?

Nor is that its grave. Oh, do not deem
That it resteth even there;
Look up! and see the mountain stream
Transfigured in the air!

"Onward!" the stream saith, "ever free;"
Thy path is still untrod;
Not in what seems thy rest must be,
But in what is—in God."

SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

THE first aim of the preacher should be to interest. He must interest, before he can hope to instruct or improve. And no matter how filled with orthodox doctrine and good advice a sermon may be, if it put the congregation to sleep, it is an abominably bad sermon.—A. K. H. B.

A. NEW ENGLAND SABBATH IN 1899.

Yarmouthville, Maine, Aug. 15.

SIR,—Coming Eastwards on Saturday last, I called at the rooms of the A.U.A. in Boston, and was agreeably surprised to meet there the Rev. William S. Key, formerly minister of our church at Boston in Old England, but now a resident of the city of the same name in America. He is spending his summer vacation at a summer camp and school of philosophy at Greenacre, on the Piscataqua River, the boundary line between the States of New Hampshire and Maine; and so the pleasure of my countryman's company was added to the attraction promised by the programme of the two schools—the Monsalvat School for the Comparative Study of Religion, and the Greenacre Lectureships—to induce me to linger for a single Sunday on my way Northwards. The very names of the places on our route called up memories of our old home—Boston, Lynn, Cambridge, Beverly, Salisbury, Essex, Ipswich, Portsmouth, Newburyport, Hampton, York, Rye, suggested the English homes of many early settlers on the western shores of the Atlantic Ocean; while one at least, Salem, might cause the cynical Englishman, travelling among his kin beyond sea, to remark that the Orthodoxy of these early New Englanders had extended even to the belief in witches, and was cruel enough to inspire deeds which equalled in atrocity any which were committed in Palestine.

We left the train at Portsmouth, a dilapidated place, with many fine old colonial mansions telling of its former importance, when one of its natives, Sir William Peppenell, in 1745, led the New England volunteers to the conquest of the French fortress at Louisbourg.

A small steam launch took us from the now almost deserted harbour up the broad Piscataqua River to Greenacre Landing. A modern summer hotel, a few old and small wooden farmhouses and about thirty canvas tents offered simple accommodation to the disciples of the various peripatetic philosophic schools collected here for their summer studies; and I soon found myself among a company who were putting into practice Wordsworth's ideal of plain living and high thinking amid singularly beautiful natural surroundings. The first meal reminded me of James Russell Lowell's words:—

The holy supper is kept, indeed,
In whatso we share with another's need.
Not that which we give, but what we share;
For the gift without the giver is bare.
Who bestows himself with his alms feeds three—

Himself, his hungering neighbour, and me.

After supper we went to the auditorium, which is built of wooden planks, and there listened to a vivid description of one of our modern American hells, the persecution of our fellow citizens of African descent by the self-styled "Gentlemen of the South." The lecturer was a white native of Ohio, now on the staff of a Boston paper. He has travelled much among the negroes of the Southern States, and has contributed many clever stories of negro life to our periodicals. His description of the brutality and the contempt for American laws and human rights shown by the Southern white in his dealings with the coloured Americans, seemed incredible to those who like myself have seen the negro principally in those Northern States, where, like the rest of us, he has a fair field and no favour.

Some seventeen years ago I spent four months in New Orleans and then saw much of negro life on the sugar plantations, in domestic service, and on the Mississippi wharves, and the relations there subsisting between white and coloured Americans did not appear to me worse than those existing between the American and the uneducated Italian, Russian, or Austrian wage-earner in our factories and coal-mines. But late events have proved that the subject of a foreign Government suspected of murder is safer in our Southern States than the native-born American citizen who defends the rights of the Afro-American. It requires far more courage on the part of our Government to defend the rights of our coloured fellow citizens south of the Potomac than to win cheap and easy victories over Spaniards and Filipinos; and it remains yet to be seen whether President McKinley and his cabinet have the moral courage necessary to fulfil their plain duty in this matter, especially in view of the fact that they need the Southern vote for Mr. McKinley's re-election to the presidency. But this is a painful topic for any friend of the United States to discuss, and I will turn from the dark topic of our Saturday night's discussion to the pleasanter features of our Sunday's meditations.

At 9 A.M., after a night's rest, either under tents or with wide open windows in our sleeping-rooms, we assembled under cover of an open tent, and listened there to a discourse by a New York editor, Mr. Brodie Patterson, on the evolution of religious thought from the time of the Adam and Eve legend to the life of Jesus. Mr. Patterson is the leader of a band of metaphysical healers who are largely represented in the Greenacre gatherings. Ever since, over forty years ago, I read James Martineau's essay on "Mesmeric Atheism" I have been much interested in the doings and teachings of those who seek to influence physiological processes by psychologic methods; and in those early days, with the aid of a German dictionary, I painfully spelled out the meaning of an essay by Immanuel Kant on the art of controlling morbid feelings by the exercise of the will-power—but Kant did not pretend to cure the ills that flesh is heir to in this way. The address, delivered without notes, was similar in its tone to those which we are accustomed to in Unitarian pulpits and college halls, and was followed by an interval of silent meditation, as in the Quaker meeting-house. At 11 A.M. we walked over to the Lysekloster pines, the rendezvous of the Monsalvat school, and there, sitting on the ground under a wide-spreading pine tree, we listened to a lecture by Professor Nathanael Schmidt, of Cornell University, on the poetry and philosophy of the Book of Job. The afternoon session, by special desire of the farming population in the neighbourhood, was devoted to a subject more closely connected with their practical necessities than the topics which attracted the city people to the Piscataqua's banks, and the Rev. E. P. Powell, a member of the editorial staff of the Chicago Unity, and a practical farmer and fruit-grower, lectured to a very large audience in the tent on "The Farming of the Twentieth Century."

Mr. Powell has been long known to the readers of our Unitarian papers as a preacher in the Third Unitarian Church at Chicago and in some Trinitarian pulpits in his earlier days. In later life he has written much for the periodicals and has "gone back to the land." The contrast which he drew between the farm-life of his childhood rousing in my own mind many a pleasant image of the milkmaids and haymakers of my Yorkshire school days, and the bestialisation of American farming in later days, when the native New England yeomanry were replaced by the most brutal class of imported labour, was more striking than pleasant; but having made profits by scientific farming in New York State, he painted a good time coming when all the resources of geology and electricity, &c., shall be applied to agriculture as effectively as art and science are now devoted to textile industry, when the American man and woman shall go back to the land; and American agriculture shall no longer be, as Liebig stigmatised it, a mere "Raub-cultur" stealing from Mother-earth all her wealth and giving nothing back to her, but shall become a vocation employing and developing the noblest gifts of manhood and womanhood.

At supper I met Mr. T. B. Pandian, of Madras, who has been lecturing at Greenacre on "Social Customs and Missionary Work in India," and in the evening Professor Egbert Morse Chesley, of Boston, lectured on "The Ideal Philosophy of Leibnitz." This Sunday's programme is a sample of the daily work from July 1. to Sept. 2 at Greenacre on the Piscataqua, far too much for one brain to assimilate, but affording a wide field for judicious choice. "Peace on Earth," "Labor," "Social Reconstruction," "Civics," "Art," "Child Study," "Psychology," "Education," "Federation of the World," "Hygiene," "Music," "Nature Study," "Comparative Religion" are all represented here by men and women of mark in American life.

The spirit of the Greenacre lectureships is expressed in a quotation from James Martineau: "I look for ultimate Unity, not from the world's coming round to me while I stand still, but from a converging movement of thought, affecting all faithful men, toward a centre of repose as yet invisible." The two months spent in the camp by people inspired with this idea have been singularly helpful in their daily living.

Dr. Lewis G. James, M.A., of Cambridge, who for many years conducted the Ethical Society in connection with the Rev. John Chadwick's church in Brooklyn, N.Y., is the director of the Monsalvat School, while Miss Farmer is the secretary of the Greenacre Lectureship.

Dr. James and his colleagues have arranged for a Liberal Religious Congress to be held at Boston, Mass., in the coming October. In the same month the National Conference of Unitarian and other independent churches is to be held at Washington, D.C.

Early next year the American Unitarian Association will celebrate its 75th anniversary in Boston, and many distinguished European visitors are invited to address the meetings. Dr. James and his friends are hoping to hold a Liberal Religious Congress in England next year, on the same lines as that Congress which was so successful at Chicago in 1893. Invitations have already been sent out for a Conference of Scientific Theology to be held at Paris during the Exposition of 1900.

Could not the Unitarians of Old and New England join their forces to try in the neighbourhood of Paris an experiment as free as that which for six years has been carried on at Greenacre in Maine? If we supply the money Professor Bonet-Maury and his French colleagues might be counted on for cordial co-operation; and a more intimate knowledge of each other's aims and operations might be obtained by the lovers of peace and justice in both nations which would be most beneficial to them and to humanity.

JOHN FRETWELL.

THE NEWCHURCH PARTY AT GREAT HUCKLOW.

ON Saturday last, amid rare bustle and with mingled feelings of appreciation and regret, the members of our party bade farewell to this peaceful village, which, for a week at any rate, had shown manifold signs of busy life. From the night of our arrival, on Aug. 19, when, after an excellent tea, we turned out of the old hall to behold a sunset of unusual brilliance, to the time when the whistle was blown for packing up, there had not been a dull moment. Our numbers exceeded those of any previous party that has taken the hall in connection with the holiday movement promoted by the Manchester District S.S. Association. To meet the needs of eighty-nine people out for a week's holiday is no light task; but, thanks to the efforts of an energetic committee, ably seconded by the kind help of the people on the spot, the arrangements and manner of carrying them out won warm expressions of praise. That there can be no better centre from which to reach some of the best Derbyshire scenery than Great Hucklow, is a contention supported by our experience. Sunday morning was spent in seeking out shady nooks or points of vantage in the immediate neighbourhood. The party broke up into sections, and became scattered in all directions. Here and there for miles might be discerned the white dresses and hats of some of our party. Some wandered to Foolow, Eyam, Tideswell, Middleton, and even as far as Hathersage. After dinner nearly the entire party attended service in the Unitarian Chapel, where the somewhat strange conditions only served to make worship more impressive and a greater delight. It was noticed that four Unitarian ministers were present in the pews. On Monday morning, either in brakes or on cycles, the whole party set out for Chatsworth, taking the road which runs through the fine scenery of Middleton Dale. To wrench ourselves from the attractions of Chatsworth House and Park was a difficult matter, but as there was a ride of seven miles before lunch, the signal was given, and the cyclists as usual at a good pace started in advance for Darley Dale. Having gained admission to the well-known Stancliffe grounds, either under tents or on the grass we sat down to a substantial and much-needed repast. At 4.30 the whistle again blew, and we set off in high glee for Haddon Hall, five miles distant. Grand, old, romantic Haddon, in point of interest it proved for us a worthy rival of Chatsworth. Even yet our day was not over, for, passing through Bakewell, we were fortunate to reach Monsal Dale before daylight failed. Thus ended a day full of delights and the stuff of which sweet memories are made. Space forbids to go through the programme of subsequent days. Each seemed to outdo the previous one in enjoyment and interest. Tuesday we devoted to the heights and caves of Castleton, some walking and others again using brakes or cycles. On Wednesday, riding brakes and cycling the whole party journeyed to Buxton, by way of Miller's Dale, Chee Tor, and Ashwood Dale. In order to introduce variety Thursday was a home-day, when tea was served in the field and the village children invited. Many thought the drive to Matlock on Friday, in some respects, to be the best of the week, but the fact is, that favoured with splendid weather and pleasant company, and in the midst of such wealth of natural beauty it was impossible to declare a preference.

For the instruction of other parties a few words may be added as to the catering which we undertook to do for ourselves. The estimates were made with great accuracy. Among other things we used 162 2 lb. loaves of bread; 64 2 lb. loaves of sweet-bread; 125 lbs. of beef and mutton; 55 lbs. of ham; 18 lbs. of tongue; 36 lbs. of butter; 6 lbs. of coffee; 5 lbs. of tea; 46 lbs. of sugar; 40 gallons of milk; and 43 doz. of lemonade, hop bitters, &c.

The following is the scale of charges for board and lodgings:—Aged 17 and over, 15s.; 16, 13s.; 15, 11s.; 14, 10s.; 13, 9s.; 12, 8s.; 11, 7s. 6d.; 10 and under, 7s. Of the total number, twenty-eight slept in the hall and the remaining sixty-one at seventeen houses in Great Hucklow, Windmill, and Grindlow. There were seventy-seven who took their meals regularly in the hall, and twelve who boarded out. A word of praise is due to the maids recommended by the Association, and also the one engaged in the village. All three worked hard and never complained. If our experience goes for anything, the establishment of a permanent holiday home at Great Hucklow would be a great boon to the schools in the Manchester district, and I have written the more fully in the hope that the Rev. Charles Peach and those who are with him in this movement may receive most enthusiastic support. For ourselves the value of the holiday spent there, not only as a means of physical health, but also of social pleasures, and spiritual renewing is not to be calculated. New friendships were formed and old ones cemented, and as in the old chapel we joined in common worship, or late at night when a deep hush was upon all things and the moon was clear we sang together such hymns as "Nearer my God to Thee," "Before Jehovah's awful Throne," "Children of the Heavenly King," "I think when I read the sweet story of old," &c., it did, indeed, seem that a holiday like this was able to strengthen faith and bind the heart closer to God.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Barnard Castle.—Sunday last was a special day at this place owing to the visit of Miss Sharpe, of London. This lady has been on a tour of visitation to some of those weaker churches which the late Mr. Spears endeavoured to keep open for Unitarian worship. And the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle, being one of them, Miss Sharpe went to see for herself what was being done, and what are the prospects for the future. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith was the preacher for the day, and there were much larger congregations than usual. At the close of his sermon in the morning on "The Gate of Heaven," Miss Sharpe addressed a few words of kindly encouragement to the congregation, and also after the evening discourse, which was on the subject: "Was Christ a Unitarian"? Mr. Charles Bell, of Redcar, to whose services as a lay-preacher our church at Barnard Castle owes much more than can be estimated, was also present during the whole of the day's proceedings. He acted as chairman for an open-air meeting which was held in Thorngate in the afternoon, he and the Rev. H. Bodell Smith giving addresses and inviting hearers to come to the evening service. The evening attendance was the largest in numbers that has been in the place for a considerable time. A short conference was held at the close, to which all remained, when Mr. Bell moved: "That we extend a hearty welcome to Miss Sharpe on the occasion of her visit to Barnard Castle, thanking her for the kind and generous interest she has taken and is taking in the welfare of this Unitarian church and struggling Unitarian churches in other parts of the country." This Mr. Bell did in a powerful and effective address; it was seconded by Mr. Ambrose Morton in very appropriate and appreciative terms; adopted by the meeting, and Miss Sharpe responded. Quite a revival of interest was manifested in the day's services. Several strangers were present, and Miss Sharpe considered there was good reason for encouragement in the work at Barnard Castle.

Bootle.—On Sunday last, on his return from a holiday, the Rev. H. W. Hawkes found in the vestry of the Free Church a rich silk pulpit gown, which had been subscribed for by a large number of his congregation as a mark of their affection. No formal presentation was made, so before commencing his sermon Mr. Hawkes briefly thanked his friends for their great kindness, assuring them that he did not need any gift to convince him of their love. The secret had been well kept, so that no whisper of their intention had reached him before the very day. There was a good congregation. Mr. Hawkes is now resuming full work after being for nearly two years, more or less, invalided with a congested throat. For the last twelve months the Rev. D. Davis has most acceptably shared the work of the church, winning respect and friendship on all hands.

Brighton (Resignation).—The Rev. A. Hood having been advised that it is absolutely necessary he should winter abroad, has resigned the pulpit of the Free Christian Church, New-road. The congregation have been naturally very unwilling to accept it, and unanimously resolved to ask Mr. Hood to reconsider it with a view to his resuming his ministry next summer. He has, however, been unable to alter his decision, as in the opinion of his medical advisers it is very uncertain when he will again be able to winter in England. His ministry of nearly thirteen years will therefore terminate in October, to the regret of his congregation and that of his fellow-workers in the various social movements with which he has identified himself.

Ilkeston.—The annual choir excursion took place on Saturday last to Cleethorpes and Grimsby. On the Saturday previous the school and chapel combined in a party held at Little Hallam. There was a good number of people present, the result being the handing over of a nice little sum towards chapel expenses. The choir festival was held on Sunday, July 30. Special music was rendered by the choir, who were assisted by Mr. and Miss Sywell, of Nottingham, and a band under the conductorship of the organist, Mr. A. E. Draper. Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Lindsay, of Christ Church, Nottingham. There was a large congregation in the evening, including the Mayor and members of the Town Council, the collection being considerably larger than last year's. The appeal made for assistance towards clearing off the debt that remains from the alterations to the chapel has met with generous response, but there is still needed between thirty and forty pounds to complete the payment.

TRANSFIGURATION.

A LIFE within this life—a world unseen
Floats softly by me, soothing my unrest;
And mystic voices pass the void between,
And call me to the Islands of the Blest.
I pass. Transfigured in the realms of love,
I am at one with Him who reigneth
there;
My raiment gloweth white as snow; I move
In harmony with all the good and fair.
H. HARROLD JOHNSON.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE jubilee of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, is to be celebrated on Wednesday and Thursday, Oct. 18 and 19. The original chapel of the congregation was in Key-street, and was licensed as a meeting-house of Protestant Dissenters on Nov. 24, 1707. On Sept. 11, 1791, Paradise-street Chapel was opened, where in 1832 the Rev. James Martineau, having removed from Dublin, entered on his Liverpool ministry. On May 9, 1848, the foundation-stone of the new Hope-street Church was laid by Mr. Thomas Bolton, chairman of the congregation, and on Thursday afternoon, Oct. 18, 1849, the church was opened, the preacher being the Rev. Thomas Madge, of Essex-street Chapel, London. On the following Sunday, Oct. 21, the services were conducted by the Rev. James Martineau and the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. On the Wednesday afternoon of the jubilee celebrations the new Congregational Hall will be opened by Mr. William B. Bowring, and presented as his jubilee gift to the congregation. In the evening service will be held in the church, conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and a sermon will be preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. On the following Thursday evening a soiree will be held at St. George's Hall.

THE International Arbitration Association have issued their first "Concord Special," consisting of a History of the Peace Conference at The Hague, dedicated by permission to Baron Pauncefote of Preston, the first British Delegate. The history, which is issued from the office of the Association, 40, Outer Temple, at 6d. net, opens with an exuberant chapter by the editor, Mr. G. H. Perris, on "The Good 'Dream' comes true at last." Then follow Impressions of the Conference, contributed to Concord by Mr. Felix Moscheles, Mr. W. T. Stead, and the Editor, and the remaining seventy-one pages of the pamphlet contain a complete chronicle of the proceedings, from the issue of the Tsar's original Rescript, Aug. 24, 1898, to the final session of the Conference, July 29 of the present year. Full particulars as to proposals and the final decisions of the Conference, especially in the matter of Arbitration, are given. The history is an invaluable record, which should be preserved by all friends of peace.

DR. KARL VON WEIZSÄCKER, who died at Tübingen on Aug. 13, was one of the chief of the liberal theologians of Germany. Born in 1822 at Oehringen, near Heibronn, he studied at the University which was to be the scene of his life work, and at Berlin, and in 1847 became privat docent at Tübingen. Fourteen years later he succeeded Baur in his professorship, having already become editor of the Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie, a post which he held for twenty-two years. In 1875 he published a new translation of the New Testament, the Old Testament being at the same time issued by Dr. E. Kautzsch. The years 1886-89 saw the issue of his great work, Das Apostolische Zeitalter. Weizsäcker was not only a liberal theologian, carrying out the fearless principles of research, which he had learnt as a pupil of Baur's, he was an ardent politician, and with strong popular sympathies on the liberal side exercised a wide influence.

WE are glad to notice in a recent issue of Der Protestant, a liberal Evangelical weekly, published in Berlin, advocating a consistent Protestantism of free inquiry, a translation of the article contributed by the Rev. C. Roper to these columns, describing the interesting experiment of a reformed public-house being made by the Rev. Sidney Street in Manchester. The same issue of Der Protestant notices a German translation of a second series of sermons by Robertson of Brighton, a first series having been issued in 1890, with a preface by Professor Harnack.

THE second "Summer School" organised by members of the Society of Friends is meeting in Birmingham this week, the first having been held at Scarborough two years ago. Over six hundred tickets of full membership have been taken, and a most admirable programme of lectures has been provided. Writing of this movement, the British Friend says that the prejudice it at first awakened in the Society is being happily overcome. "It is seen more clearly that such agencies as a Summer School do not mean the setting up of intellectual study above spiritual insight, but rather the endeavour to learn how to dedicate to the service of God, of the Society, and of humanity, all the powers with which we have been endowed. We cannot worthily do the work which God has given us while we are starving our minds, or refusing to hear the "many things" which our Lord has yet to say to us. That our hearts may be full it is not needful that our heads should be empty. The programme itself, and the names which appear upon it, are guarantee enough that the true aims of life—the absolute necessity of personal experience and illumination in the things of God—the need of a higher morality and a more living devotedness to Christ and humanity—will not be overlooked, but will be put in their place, as that to which all intellectual learning is subordinate."

THE present meetings in Birmingham recall to our mind a most interesting volume, published two years ago, "Echoes from Scarborough Summer School," in which were collected some of the most valuable papers read in the school, showing the quality of the work done and the spirit which pervaded what was felt to be a remarkable and most stimulating gathering. There are papers on various aspects of Bible teaching, three addresses on "Inspiration" by Dr. Thomas H. Hodgkin, Anne W. Richardson, B.A., and William C. Braithwaite, LL.B., B.A.; and the volume concludes with three papers by John S. Rowntree on "The Place of the Society of Friends in the Religious Life of England," dealing with (i.) Friends in the Seventeenth Century, (ii.) The Attitude of Friends towards Language and Religious Liberty, (iii.) The Present Position of Friends in English Society. Their attitude towards Philanthropy. The papers are still fresh with living interest. (Headley Bros. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE Bishop of Rochester has addressed a very judicious letter to those of his clergy who, as using incense in their churches, are directly affected by the recent decision of the Archbishop. The full text of the letter appears in this week's Guardian, from which we take the following passage :—

I confidently hope to find that, however reluctantly, you forestall me in the opinion that the only right and loyal course for the clergy and the congregations concerned is to obey, and to be forward to obey, this grave and deliberate ruling by the highest authorities in our Church, and the admonition or wish by which that ruling is accompanied. I use intentionally the word "obey," not because this is a legal judgment, for the Archbishops themselves tell us otherwise; nor because it carries with it any directly coercive authority, for I suppose that it does not; but because I am looking at the matter from the side of the honest and dutiful conscience of the faithful Churchman. Such conscience, recognising the presence of the substance of real authority will, I believe, see in the lack of compulsory power only an additional reason for the ready tender of obedience. No doubt it will be to you an unwelcome and irksome duty. But duty carries with it its own compensations. Anxious responsibility disappears when duty becomes plain, and the real strength of any case is increased and displayed by discipline and duty. But close behind duty in this case lie two other reasons: the first, prudence, which is a part of duty; and the other, charity. There is great need at the present moment for some plain and striking sign that that part of the Church to which you belong is ready to make sacrifices for obedience' sake and unity's sake. For some such sign of real dutifulness the moral sense of the country, puzzled by our ecclesiastical confusions, has been looking; and some such sign you have, I think, desired to give. To give it is an act of charity, because it will reassure and draw together many anxious and disquieted hearts.

As to the Act of Uniformity and possible Disestablishment, as a result of the present controversies, Dr. Talbot further writes:—

We have always known that we lived under Acts of Uniformity. We have known that in the vicissitudes of revolutionary times in Church and State we could not produce for every detail, every moment, exact and satisfactory ecclesiastical sanction. What we have felt was that in the main the Church did accept the changes; and that the present settlement, that of 1662, when the Convocation revised the Prayer-book and presented it to Parliament to be enforced by the Act of Uniformity, has her explicit authority. But we must not forget that the Act of Uniformity does represent treaty terms and a common standard as between different opinions within the Church. The Archbishop's strong sense of justice makes him feel this, and I would venture (writing without authority) to say that this more than Parliamentary authority in itself is what really appeals to his mind. The State connection may hamper us for a time; whether or no we should keep it or break it is a question of enormous importance, which must be slowly and carefully decided partly (under God's guidance) by what is sometimes usefully called the logic of events; but it is only nervous and short-sighted counsel which makes a bugbear of that connection at every step.

THE Bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln, have also written to those of their clergy concerned, counselling ready obedience and a spirit of forbearance and conciliation. Dean Hole, of Rochester, has written to Lord Halifax, à propos of his address to the lay members of the English Church Union, announcing his withdrawal from the Union, on the ground, to quote the words of the letter, that "you have lost a great opportunity for the promotion of order and peace by advising the lay members to 'stand by and help those priests who may feel that they must resist the officers of the Church,' which simply means that the laity must obey, but that the clergy may disobey, those who are set over them in the Lord; that the soldiers must follow the captains, but that the captains may follow their own imaginations."

THE current number of the Free Church Chronicle refers to a candid and courteous review of the new Free Church Catechism which appeared in the Guardian of Aug. 9. The review says that Churchmen will recognise the Catechism as "a strong reinforcement in their battle for dogmatic truth," and that it "represents a further step towards the triumph of the contention that the security of the faith in our time demands of all bodies of Christians a stronger enforcement of definite and formulated doctrine."

The Guardian recognises that the opposition between the High Anglican doctrine of the Church, ministry, and sacraments, and the doctrine on the same subjects expounded in the Free Church Catechism, is irreconcilable. We are glad that our contemporary is so frank. Nothing is gained by blinking obvious facts. We have a battle to fight. Let us be fully persuaded that we are fighting for a real and vital issue. "Which is wrong," says the Guardian, "God will show in His own time." Our appeal is to the same quarter. . . . The Free Church Catechism says that "the decisive proof of a valid ministry is the sanction of the Divine Head of the Church, manifested in the conversion of sinners and the edification of the body of Christ." The Guardian does not agree. "Surely," says our contemporary, "this can be no proof of office. Dr. Browning converted many convicts, and Wilberforce much edified the Church, yet one remained a medical doctor and the other a lay member of Parliament." Has the Guardian ever heard of the Apostle Paul? Does our contemporary forget that he was a tent-maker? We cannot suppose that it would deny that the great Apostle of the Gentiles exercised a valid ministry. Or what would become of the doctrine of Apostolic Succession?

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD has written to The Times pleading for toleration of the sacerdotalists in the Church of England, but at the same time for equal recognition of liberal churchmen. The process of free inquiry has led to a re-examination of the data of Christianity, with the result that "within Christianity there are now two distinct Christianities, two doctrines of God, of Incarnation, of Sin. The one is the Christianity of tradition, the other is the Christianity of a free and critical thought." This latter Christianity, with which the names of Jowett, Caird, Martineau and Green are connected, should have a fully recognised position side by side with the other in the National Church.

THE Rev. C. Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit is a lesson in tolerance under the title "You may be mistaken": A caution for the too sure." The text is taken from Cromwell's message to the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, 1650, before the battle of Dunbar, and the sermon draws out the lesson from that historical instance of the contrast between the attitude of the Independents as represented by Cromwell and the Presbyterians in the matter of religious toleration. Towards the close of the sermon Mr. Hargrove says:—

"Once let this be admitted by the churches (that we are all liable to error) and true tolerance, ungrudging and respectful, will for the first time be established on earth. We shall still indeed hold by our own convictions, but in such way that we shall find fault with none merely because they 'follow not with us.' Once let us make the confession, which Cromwell in vain tried to elicit from the Kirk leaders, 'it is possible we may be mistaken,' and none will hold in scorn the neighbour who believes more than he does, nor accuse of impiety him who does not believe as much. Each cherishing his own faith as the best and truest known to himself, he will respect the honest conviction of every other as that which in his circumstances, and according to his capacity and knowledge, is the best and truest to which he can as yet attain. So, and so only, shall we be on the high way towards that Reunion of the Churches which is sought in vain by insistence on a form of words and compromise on the meaning to be attached to them."

THE September number of Le Crétien Français, the organ of the revolted Catholic priests in France, edited by M. Bourrier in the interests of evangelical reform within the Catholic Church, contains a full account of the reception of M. Bourrier and a number of the other priests at St. James's Hall, which we recorded at the time. Warm gratitude for the cordiality of that reception is expressed.

THIS month's Seed Sower contains the second part of a biographical address on Richard Baxter by the late Dr. Sadler, of which the first part appeared in the August number.

THE Rev. W. Harrison is recounting in the New Kingdom the experiences of his recent journey in the East. In the September number, he tells about Cairo, and will have more to say about Egypt. In the same number, Mr. Henry Woodhead writes of the Sunday School Teachers' Summer School at Oxford, and the Rev. C. J. Street, under the title, "Our Churches and the Young," tells of what has been done at Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, in holding Preparation Classes and Reception Services for the welcome of young people as members of the congregation.

WE have read with shame of the large attendance of English visitors at the brutal and degrading bull fights, held on the last two Sundays, contrary to the law, at Boulogne.

SLEEP.

He giveth His beloved sleep!
Slumber more beautiful and deep
Than summer calm upon the floods,
Or hush of windless solitudes.
And so at morning's golden hour,
When wakes no more the lovely flower,
We cannot sigh, we cannot weep,—
He giveth His beloved sleep!

He giveth His beloved sleep!
Slumber more wonderful and deep
Than falls upon the aching soul,
As the dark years relentless roll.
And so in evening's holy face,
Tearless we find redeeming grace;
We cannot mourn, His hand we keep,—
He giveth His beloved sleep!

MIND, it is our best work that He wants, not the dregs of our exhaustion. I think He must prefer quality to quantity.—G. MacDonald.

WHAT IS RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE?

A FAVOURITE doctrine of many religious thinkers may perhaps be expressed as follows. It is only possible for us to know, or even to think of, the existence of God, because the Divine Life is present to us or in us directly and immediately; on the basis of this direct experience our intelligence works as it were by a reconstructive vision, interpreting it, and so producing ideas, questions, and theories about God and about things divine.

To the present writer this doctrine seems to be profoundly true and important; but the difficulties which it presents to many minds are very great, and a discussion of some of these may be of service.

Let us first expand and explain the main thought. Whenever we have a vivid consciousness of the worth of some human Ideal, we have also—in however vague or germinal a form—a direct consciousness of the Divine Life as a present Reality, sustaining the Ideal. No one is entirely without this God-consciousness; but, like all our consciousness, it is the interpretation of an experience; so that the experience may be expressed in a more true or a more mistaken form, and also may itself vary in extent, depth, or worth. Thus it is possible to be a fellow-worker with the Divine Life and Labour, and to feel it and know it also; it is possible to feel as well as know that the Eternal is our resting-place and underneath us are the everlasting arms—that the Power Divine is quickening the spirit and inspiring strength within. The moments when such experiences are vividly felt and clearly interpreted, are indeed rare; one aspect or the other, the strength of the experience or the interpretation of it, only too often fails. But only wilful blindness can deny its reality for some and its possibility for all; and this, when it really happens, is the highest moment in worship, the most precious moment in our whole life. Some of the ways in which it comes to pass may be spoken of in particular.

We may feel and know the Eternal Love of God shining to us, as it were, through the beauty and glory of the world in which we live. This thought, which has been the special inspiration of modern poetry in the Western world, need not be dwelt on here. But sometimes Divine peace and strength rise on our hearts, uncalled for by the outward world. In sorrow and suffering there is "a deeper voice across the storm"; a voice, still and small, yet stronger than the tumult of our grief, saying, "It is I—be not afraid." I will mention two expressions of this, which have reached me. One says: "This (the feeling of God's sustaining presence) only came to me after great trouble—very depths of trouble; and the realisation of God which it brought seemed to make all the trouble worth while. But I cannot put it properly into words, and I do not like to try." Another: "My experience tells me that it is in and after sorrow of the most hopeless sort—as in the death of one we love—that God's relation to us is felt to be at once personal and fuller, richer and more comforting than any human personal relations can be." Many could bear witness to this, if they were willing or able to speak. A similar experience arises at times when the presence of something true or beautiful or good uplifts us above ourselves. He who is working for some noble or precious cause—be it the cause of Truth, scientific thought and discovery—or the cause of Beauty, to which the artist gives his heart—or, highest of all, steadfast faithful work in the cause of duty and human welfare, in the great world, the city, or the home—when one gives himself up to such a cause, he sometimes finds that he is not alone, even if others give no sympathy, no help; he seems to rest upon an Almighty strength that flows into him and, as we said, uplifts him above himself. And so he becomes possessed of a power which is more than the power of his single self. The very strength of God has revealed itself within him.

There are many who will be ready to say, "But nothing of this kind ever comes to me." In reality it may come and we may scarcely recognise it. There are psychological laws which explain how this may be. We must remember first that every one's soul or real self—call it what you will—is not something with a substantially fixed constitution, and which is self-contained, like a sphere—a sort of "mighty atom," a thing with definite limits, which grows only by adding on new habits or new pieces of knowledge. The real self is a thing which is always growing by putting forth native powers, assimilating its experiences, and organising them according to laws of its own. In the next place, the limits of the self are not at all clearly defined: they certainly are not the same as the limits of clear consciousness. That part of our experiences and inner thoughts and feelings of which we are clearly conscious (i.e., which we fully know that we have) is only a small part of what we really experience and think and feel all the time. The deeper currents of feeling, for the person himself who feels them, are the easiest to overlook; but they are none the less really stirring within him, and perhaps producing their effects among the feelings of which he is clearly conscious; and so it is with thought and with desire. In a word—self-knowledge has degrees of truth; at one time it may be more, at another less; and we never "know" or consciously take in with perfect accuracy the whole of what is stirring within us.

If then our real self is not a self-contained thing, there is nothing contradictory in supposing that it is rooted in an Infinite Being, in whom every human spirit has its roots, and who is the source of life and strength to all. And if our distinct or clear consciousness of ourselves always has different degrees of truth, then in many cases it may not extend far enough to take in the "roots" of our being; we may not recognise our connection with or dependence upon the Infinite and Universal. Or, again, there may be a vague sense of dependence, a "longing," which may have to satisfy itself as best it can among the opportunities afforded by the interests and duties of life outside the individual. Or, once more, this vague "divine discontent" may rise to a consciousness of our dependence on the Divine Life, and of God's sustaining help.

Lastly, we need to remember that the experience of God's real existence is not something apart from all the human interests and natural experiences of life; it can only come through these. The roots that join man to God are the same as those that join men to one another and to Nature, only they go deeper. Hence it is a serious mistake to say that the realisation of God "will come if you try to have it." We cannot sincerely try to have a sense of God's presence, for the very attempt makes the thought of self so prominent as to obscure not only the divine relation which we seek, but even our relation to the ordinary interests of life. What we seek can only come by merging the thought of self in reverence for life and its duties. Unless we lose ourselves in enthusiasm for some worthy cause—in love, in work, or in trouble, it may be—we can never reach that realisation of ourselves which leads to the consciousness of God.

Confusion is often thrown around this profoundly important question, when an experience is misinterpreted, and the mistaken interpretation regarded as of equal worth and importance with the experience itself. Thus, suppose some one is convinced that he realises the presence of a Personal Being "outside himself" who cares for him. His statement is a pure contradiction in terms, if "outside" means "apart from." One cannot have a direct apprehension, by way of feeling, of something from which oneself is detached. That which is directly present to us in experience is that from which ex vi termini we are not detached—it is that whose Life we share. All that the expression "outside oneself" can mean here, is that the Power whose inner presence is felt and known is a Power on which one's own small struggling self is dependent, and which is far more than oneself—deeper, stronger, more abiding. Hence while no one can truly say that he simply has no such experience, no one can say that his own interpretation of the experience has absolute accuracy or truth.

I will try to give a symbolic statement of this view of religious experience. Let us suppose that a mighty temple is building, whose towers are to touch the heavens, and which is to be a divine habitation for all the race of men; and that all men are ever busy, year after year, century after century, making the vast pile slowly grow. Each one, as he plies his task with ceaseless industry, can scarcely see the temple, through the scaffolding, the dust and noise, the toil and toil of the building. But behind all this there is the growing temple of God and man. Such is the growth of civilisation and the world: the temple which God is inspiring man to build. The stress and strain of the labour is such that we do not feel and know the Power that besets us behind and before, and stirs us up to be ever at the work; and we do not clearly see the "steady gain" of the work itself or the "unceasing purpose" that runs through man's labour. It is not through lack of "faith" that we fail to find God everywhere. The difficulty is not a mere lack of faith or hope or love; it is that what we have of them is scattered up and down our lives and used up bit by bit. We want the many faiths which we have—or the good that is in them—brought together into one. There is a homely proverb which may be used to illustrate the truth here: if we cannot find God in our lives it is because we cannot see the forest for the trees. And so the presence of the Supreme Spirit, the fountain-source of all that is best in our daily faiths and hopes and loves and interests, may not be thought of. But though when busied with the details of daily life we may not find it, it is there, within us and behind us for ever.

If then we seem not able to worship the Divine Life by consciously finding its help and strength flowing into us and making strong our work; then let us worship it by working with it, contented with just the thought that we are helping the kingdom of God to grow. Such is indeed the necessary beginning of the higher worship. It is possible for all to feel and know the inspiration of God, the breathing of Divine Power into themselves; but only through work. Without the work, the active productive energy of spirit which makes and moulds experience, experience itself can never yield us a sense of God's presence. This is what all the great poets and prophets of to-day tell us: Browning, Tennyson, Goethe, Carlyle, Ruskin alike say, Worship must begin with work. Find some good to do in your surroundings, and do it with your might; and in the end, through your own spirit, the inspiration will come.

S. H. MELLONE.

THE MORAL ASPECT OF HEREDITY.

I.—THE INEVITABLENESS OF VICE.

F. W. ROBERTSON says: "Every misery that falls on man has been the consequence of transgression, his own trespass or those of others. It may have been his parents, his grandparents, or his far back ancestors, who have given him the disadvantages under which he labours." We might carry this further: not only are our miseries the result of past error, but also in our moral disabilities and deformities we are suffering the effects of past weakness and transgression. For while to each individual there is given some power of self-determination in the controlling of his own actions, yet as far as the matter of bias is concerned he cannot be held accountable, for the same law that regulates our physical and intellectual endowments controls our moral tendencies. There are moral limitations as there are intellectual: that our capabilities are the measure of our possible achievement is a truism. We are only responsible in so far as we are free; and in respect of all inherent tendencies we are merely the involuntary and irresponsible product of our predecessors. Irresponsible, only in so far as we are the effect and not the cause; responsible, just in that degree in which we have freedom to repress or indulge such tendencies.

In our inherited character lies hidden the accumulated experience of past generations. By their efforts further achievement is made possible to us; by their weakness we are handicapped. For nothing can happen until it has been led up to and made possible; and although all discovery, all new thought and revelation comes as a flash of light from the Unseen, yet it can come only as the mind is prepared to receive it. One generation's characteristics are reproduced and developed in the next. Moral strength is the seed from which spring the Future's martyrs and heroes; moral weakness culminates in posterity in some hideous vice.

Such a view of the working of Heredity is apt to paralyse individual effort. We gladly throw the responsibility of our failings back upon our ancestors, and take refuge behind the plausible theories of Predestination and Fatalism. Yet it is doubtful whether any man has ever honestly questioned his own freewill. For, notwithstanding the knowledge of our limitations, we are conscious of having just so much freedom as permits of choice. There are continually placed before us two alternative lines of conduct—the lower and the higher. We have liberty, at least in some degree, to raise or to degrade ourselves. It is not demanded of us that we should reach up to any prescribed standard, but only that we shall not fall below the measure of our possibilities. This is demanded alike of the man of high moral instincts or the man of a lower type. Each has equally the option of rising or of sinking; and this much responsibility is ours, that we improve and not degrade whatever inheritance has fallen to our lot.

Of all the laws of Nature this of Heredity appears upon the surface the most remorseless in its cruelty and injustice. What bitterness has it engendered, what torture has it inflicted! With what studied partiality are its gifts of intellect, beauty, health, culture and character distributed! We have grown to accept its ruling as unquestioningly as the law of gravitation. A worthy son is looked upon as a fitting tribute to his father's integrity; a vicious child is considered a righteous judgment upon the intemperance or dishonesty of his ancestry. But what of the child's misfortune in inheriting these evil tendencies? Why should the child be victimised for his father's sins? The justice of the judgment passed upon the parent appears so obvious, that the situation from the child's standpoint is usually overlooked.

Here is a soul born into the world, imprisoned in a human frame in which the baser elements of our nature predominate. In earliest childhood these tendencies manifest themselves, and we confidently predict for the child an ignoble manhood. Such a case is by no means an infrequent one, and we account for its existence by the fact of the subject coming of unprincipled or dissolute parentage. This we say not in extenuation of the failings of the son but in explanation of them, and by way of demonstrating the just and inevitable consequences of sin. But justice must be done to the child as well as to the parent. Why should a child, through no voluntary act or choice of his own, be condemned to live his life already damned from his birth?

There are two classes of men ever ready with their panacea for such cases. The first of these is the conventional moralist, who from his youth up has kept all the commandments except that new and best commandment. Himself free from any "taints of blood," he sits in judgment upon his weaker brothers. He takes no account of inherent tendencies; in the weakness of the flesh he sees nothing but insubordination and presumption. The terrible problems of vice are clear as daylight to him. His cure is more rigorous discipline; building more prisons; screwing tighter the grip of the law upon the criminal: he would drive men into rectitude through fear and torture.

The second class is that of the religious enthusiast who claims to have found in his special form of religion an antidote for vice. But he, too, is equally ready to turn persecutor. Tell him there are cases his remedy fails to reach, and he quickly shows the mailed fist beneath his soft exterior. "Such a one," he will answer, "if there be such a one, must go to his doom—he is on the level of the brutes, unworthy the name of a man." Yet such denunciations in no way help towards a solution of the problem. To classify a man as brute or demon does not dispose of him: he still remains and has to be dealt with. Some other method than vindictiveness, some more potent influence than a particular scheme of theology, must be employed if you would seek to raise the degraded to a higher life.

It has been well said that whatever is inevitable is profitable. In other words, all results, however terrible the form they take, are subject to the law of Benefit. The perfectness of God's laws admits of no failure. "Whatever is, is right"—even the hideous spectres of Disease and Vice and Crime, having through the nature of things become inevitable, cannot be working towards ultimate ruin. Unless we lay firm hold of this truth, we shall be in danger of falling into one of two errors.

1.—We shall be liable to attach too much responsibility to the individual. To hold a man responsible for his inherited instincts is as unreasonable as to lay upon him the blame of some physical deformity. Yet judgment and vengeance are the approved methods of dealing with the sinner; he is as severely castigated as though he himself had originated the evil which was inherent in him. If we would get at the root of the matter, we must go back into his ancestry; nor even then should we be able to lay the blame upon this one or that, we should see that the evil has been a natural growth, and that the first cause lies far back hidden in the same obscurity which envelops all first causes.

It is no irreverence, but rather the highest exercise of faith, to say that with the Creator lies the first responsibility. There are no depths of infamy to which a human being can sink but have been foreseen, and—to the extent that it has been left possible for him so to sink—ordained, since first the world emanated from the mind of God.

2.—Another error into which we shall be liable to fall is that of Despondency and Pessimism. This is the danger of the sensitive soul to whom the suffering or the guilt of another is terrible as his own. It is not difficult to trace the hand of a beneficent Providence in the transmitting of high and noble qualities, but where the thing inherited is not good but bad, then it appears no longer as Beneficence but Retribution. To a sympathetic soul, it is not enough that the law should work only for the good of a favoured few: surely the integrity of one half the race were dearly bought by the degradation of the other! No amount of virtue gained could compensate for the desolation of a single soul. Unless the rule of Heredity can be shown to act with impartial beneficence upon all its subjects alike, ought we not to hesitate before transmitting our failings to posterity? How often does it happen that what in the father is considered an amiable weakness, in the son takes a graver form!

Who is there so pure that he can feel confident of handing down to his descendants nothing that by any possibility may work for their destruction? Is there not in each of us some failing, some weakness against which we have to strive? Indolence, self-indulgence, arrogance, jealousy, intolerance, vanity—are not these the germs which, amongst other environments, or under different mental or physical conditions, might have developed into vice? Rather than risk the awful danger of perpetuating evil, it were better that the race should become extinct.

Unless we can find the silver thread of a great Purpose winding through each soul's experience of suffering and sin, this world is indeed a ghastly spectacle—Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden-eyed despair.

But of the outlook of a better hope a farther article must speak.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Contemporary contains a series of five letters, written in 1875 by John Henry Newman (three years before he was made a cardinal) to his nephew, the Rev. J. R. Mozley, in answer to questions and criticisms of the Roman Catholic Church, in regard to the apparent discrepancy between the character claimed by that Church and the actual moral results in the hierarchy itself and in the nations where the Church holds complete sway. The letters are of the greatest interest, but are, of course, based on the huge assumptions of the Roman Church, and in no way meet the argument drawn from the strong moral and religious life found in heretical countries. In the same review Dr. Guinness Rogers deals with the Archbishops and the Ritualists, suggesting that Dr. Temple's conduct in his recent "Hearing" and decision savoured rather of the Headmaster of Rugby than of the Archbishop, and that with no such intention his attempt to make peace and avoid conflict with the extremists and the present law of the Church of England has been in fact a surrender to the lawlessness which is so much deprecated. Disestablishment alone, he says, can give true liberty to the Church; it would simply mean "a return to the spiritual warfare—the battle between truth and error." Mr. Charles Booth introduces a most interesting report on an experiment in public-house management, showing the results in five selected houses in London, in which the managers had no interest in pushing the sale of intoxicants, but received 20 per cent. of the profit on food and other drinks sold, with strict orders as to management and the quality of goods supplied. What seemed to be proved was that with a capable manager and skilful suggestion of wholesome food readily at hand a good deal might be done to create a demand for it. As railway refreshment rooms cater impartially for all wants, so Mr. Booth thinks the tone of public-houses might be improved. He looks to private enterprise, rather than the efforts of public bodies, to find the way. Of the article by Mr. Richard Heath, "But is God silent?" we have spoken in another column.

In the Nineteenth Century Mr. Sidney Low writes on "The Future of Great Armies," making little of the results of the Conference at The Hague, and after drawing a striking contrast between the rottenness of the French army and the strength of the German, urging that the system of compulsory service in Germany is in fact a fine education to the young recruits, in which personal interest and healthy moral oversight on the part of the officers plays an important part. The moral drawn is that the length of compulsory service will have to be increased rather than diminished (and something of the kind introduced into this country also), but that the element of education will have to be largely increased, so that the men will be prepared at the same time for industrial pursuits at the end of their term of service. One of the most interesting articles in this number is Mr. W. A. Sommerville's account of his experiences as a resident in the King's Cross "Rowton House," vivid in its picture of the wholesome and wonderfully economical living to be had there and of the residents, and wise in its suggestions of future hopeful developments on the same or similar lines, both for women and for families.

The Fortnightly has an instructive article on the Philosophy of the Dreyfus case, by M. André Godfernaux, in which it is shown that the conflict has been between the friends of truth and justice and the friends of order at all costs, even of forgery, lying, and the basest treachery, as represented in the army. In the turmoil of the present controversy he sees tokens of great transformations preparing, especially in the sphere of morals and religion. "France, oppressed by the Latin tradition, without any counterpoise, was threatened with the slow death of Spain. She was stifling by degrees in inert servility of conscience, in superstitious idolatry for lifeless formula." "But the 'affair' awoke the sacred fire slumbering in all consciences, and displayed the virtues of free investigation." In the impulse thus given to a more independent and resolute life lies the hope of France for the future. In the same review Miss Alice Law tells of a new "Caroline Common-place Book," in which she has found some fresh verses of the well-known poem,

"The World's a bubble and the life of man

Less than a span,"

variously attributed to Donne, Harrington and Lord Bacon. She adduces good reason for thinking that the actual author was Sir Henry Wotton, the friend of Donne. One of the verses, hitherto unknown, is as follows:—

"We fancy home as if that attuned earth gave our souls birth Travell displayes mens Customes habits parts
And these their hearts
Warr is a Kingdoms physicke peace its health
Their offspring wealth
What then remaines but to desire of twain
Never to dy or straight be born again."

The book also contains seven hymns of praise, which Miss Law takes to be by George Herbert, written in fulfilment of the purpose expressed in his "Praise."

"Wherefore with my utmost heart
I will sing to thee
And the cream of all my heart
I will bring to thee.

Seven whole days, not one in seven

I will praise thee

In my heart though not in heaven

I can raise thee."

In the National Review Miss Irby gives an account of Don Miraglia, the revolting priest of Piacenza, of whom we have heard from time to time from his friend Signor Bracciforti, of Milan. Miraglia is a Sicilian by birth, and in 1895 was called to Rome by his friend and fellow-countryman, Mgr. Carini, prefect of the Vatican Library, to assist him in editorial work; but Carini almost immediately fell a victim to the machinations of the Jesuits, and Miraglia was sent to Piacenza to preach the May sermons in honour of Mary. He is evidently a man of the greatest eloquence, and was unsparing in his denunciation of the Jesuits; hence his excommunication, and the birth of his popular movement for a reformed National and Catholic Church in Italy. A touching picture is given of the devotion of the people to their priest, and of their church, the Oratorio of S. Paolo, formed out of the stable and part of the picture gallery of an old Palazzo, placed at their disposal by the owners. The church was furnished by Signora Mazzini, a niece of the great patriot. On the walls are to be seen pictures of the King of Italy, Ugo Bassi, Savonarola, and others. Above the altar rails is a banner with the motto, Amore, Lavoro, Armonia. The work is carried on with apostolic simplicity. Miss Irby's only fear is that Miraglia's strength will not long stand the strain of incessant work, though his influence in the country is steadily increasing.

In connection with the meeting of the Institute of Journalists at Liverpool, Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) preached a special sermon, about 150 journalists being present in the congregation. His text was, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness." He would not, he said (as reported in the Christian World), enter into the futile and irritating controversy as to whether the Pulpit was more influential than the Press, for though the journalist and the preacher worked to a large extent in the same field their functions were different. Putting it roughly, the burden of the Christian minister was the culture of the human soul, and the burden of the Press was the education of the nation. One of the services the Press could render was to sustain a worthy national ideal. It could discourage that vulgar and blatant patriotism which considered that the prosperity of a nation lay in the extent of its possessions, the size of its warships, and the returns of the Board of Trade. What we had to do was to choose on the one hand between that gross materialism which magnified huge fortunes, military glory and success in sport, and revelled in satiable pleasures; and on the other, that national idealism which would never be satisfied until every member of the Commonwealth was thoroughly educated, and had the means of living and became a son of God. The Press could also create a wholesome public opinion—that kind of atmosphere in which everything that was base withered and goodness flourished. The Press had an advantage over the pulpit in that it taught men six days in the week, and they did not know they were being taught.

THE LATE SIR PHILIP AND LADY MANFIELD.

MEMORIAL SERVICES.

SPECIAL SERVICES were held in Kettering-road Church, Northampton, on Sunday last, in memory of Sir Philip and Lady Manfield. In the morning a number of Sir Philip's co-workers in public life, connected with other religious bodies, were present. The services were conducted by the Rev. John Byles, minister of the church, who officiated for the first time since his recent illness. Among the hymns sung were the beautiful lines by William Gaskell, which had a peculiar fitness for the occasion:—

Calmly, calmly lay him down:
He hath fought a noble fight,
He hath battled for the right,
He hath won the fadeless crown.

The special anthem sung by the choir was Dr. Bridge's setting of Mrs. Browning's poem, with the refrain "He giveth His beloved sleep." The lesson (Romans xii.) was read by Mr. J. Sale. In his usual address to the children, Mr. Byles referred to the late Sir Philip and Lady Manfield, who had lived their lives as the preacher wanted all the young people to live, "Letting their light so shine before men that they may see their good works, and glorify their Father who is in heaven."

Mr. Byles based his sermon on the words: "David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep" (Acts xiii. 36). It was impossible, he said, to conceive a summary of a good man's life at once so brief, so complete and so entirely satisfactory as the words of his text. In that church they looked back on the close of a very long and very successful career, successful not only in a vulgar sense, but in the noblest and highest sense, and they would do well to ask themselves what were the secrets and the occasions of that success, and the lessons it should teach. First there were the personal relationships which Sir Philip Manfield was so happy to possess all through life. Every man who is made at all has to make himself; and if a man has not pluck and purpose and determination to make himself, no ancestry and no conditions will ever make him. We are all to be self-made men or we shall never be made at all. But whilst that is true, it is also true that a good many of us owe an enormous, immeasurable debt to the stock from which we come, to the parents who tended our early years, to the conditions which surrounded us in childhood, and the influences which year after year were brought to play upon us. Sir Philip rejoiced to speak of his mother, a woman of self-education, of a very great and lofty character, a woman who was faithful to her convictions whatever the price she had to pay. It was a beautiful story of her undertaking the education of her son for seven years rather than send him to a school where he would be indoctrinated in a creed she was unable to accept. That was the action of a mother of whom any man might well be proud; no wonder the manhood that resulted. Then there was another good woman, Mary Carpenter, who left her mark for good upon the growing lad; nor could they forget to mention her who for fifty years was the partner of his life. Hers was a beautiful life, and the memory thereof still fills the home and the church. To her and to her sisters, Sir Philip often said he owed far more than he could say. Happy, thrice happy, is the man who going through life is blessed in the womanhood by whom he is surrounded. Sir Philip also owed much to his religion. His religion was very simple, quite free from dogma; it had about it no experiences which were unhealthy, which were morbid, which were injurious to the soul, as are so many spiritual experiences. His creed might be summed up in the words of Whittier:—

Amid the maddening maze of things,
And tossed by storm and flood,
To one fact true my spirit clings:
I know that God is good.

His religion was so real to him and so valued that he constantly took great care to cherish it. He set the greatest store upon the services and worship of God's house. He said, "I never neglected the weekly service; and it was a great thing for me in those days when I was battling in the battle of life to be lifted once a week into a higher, calmer, and clearer atmosphere."

Sir Philip Manfield was born into a little community of Christians, at that time somewhat scorned, but he did not leave it for one more popular, or larger, or more fashionable. Moreover, he had ideals, he had great ambition. Not any vulgar ambition to pile up a big fortune or to leave behind inordinate wealth. His ambition was to do good work, whether it was the work of a servant or the work of a master. His ambition was to build up and consolidate a noble business, a business which should be the means, not simply of producing wealth to himself, but blessing and benefit to those whom he employed. His ambition was to take the wealth which business brought and to use it, not for ostentatious display, but for the benefit of his fellow-men and the service of truth and righteousness. Of course, he had his difficulties, his times of dispute and conflict; but through them all he came out stainless and honourable. The fact that soon after the great dispute in the town he was elected by popular vote with such an immense majority as member of the borough was a striking proof of the rectitude of his actions. He had ambition truly, ambition to do good. To read the list of the societies of which he was president or vice-president, or on whose committees he sat, was simply bewildering; to read the number of societies he helped by personal effort or his money, was quite startling; and in that church they witnessed one of the great gifts of his life, a gift which no doubt for centuries to come will commemorate the munificence of spirit and the faithfulness to principle and to conscience of those whose names are inscribed on the commemoration tablet before them. People knew what he gave when it was put down in subscription lists and expended in church building, but who knew what he gave in secret; "That best portion of a good man's life," as Wordsworth said, "His little nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love." They were not all unremembered, they were not all undiscovered. The preacher was greatly touched by hearing the story of the strike days, how his hand, unknown, was feeding the women and the children of the very men who reviled him and hooted him and even pelted him with stones as he passed along the street.

The man who could act as Sir Philip Manfield acted in those circumstances, had much of the spirit of Jesus, who from the cross exclaimed, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Another ambition Sir Philip had was for mental culture. Nothing astonished Mr. Byles more than that Sir Philip was able in the midst of a busy and active life so largely to cultivate his own mind and secure the acquaintance with literature he possessed; and in this connection the preacher urged young people to learn the lesson that they were to glorify God not only by their bodies and spirits, but by their minds as well, and they could not glorify God with their minds unless they took some pains to cultivate them. They should not be content with reading the trash they could purchase in the news shops, they should read good books of real worth.

Sir Philip's life and character and name were a heritage to their church and to the town; and, beyond that, they were a trumpet call to duty, a call to embody his example in their lives and to tread, so far as they could, in his steps. For again, as the poet says: "Lives of great men all remind us, We can make our lives sublime." That was the lesson Mr. Byles wanted to urge upon those still comparatively young. He had no doubt that the service of humanity, which, of course, was the service of God, during the coming century would be somewhat different from the century now passing away. Wider, more varied, perhaps more secular, but not less religious, will be the service men will be called upon to render to their day and generation according to the will of God. The organisations which will be employed to accomplish this service will be not exactly ecclesiastical, but civic and social, municipal, national. The people as a whole, through their representatives and leaders, will set themselves for the betterment of social life, will seek, if they are wise, to induce such conditions that it will become easier for men to do right, and difficult, far more difficult than it has been in the past, for men to do wrong. They will seek to induce such conditions that the vast increase of wealth which he thought with absolute certainty would come during the next thirty, forty, or fifty years, will not be concentrated in the hands of a few, but contribute to the enrichment of the body politic, and to the increase of joy and happiness and well-being of the commonwealth, and, therefore, of the people as a whole. Work like that will demand leaders, and those leaders will have to be not merely clever men, but men of principle and character, men who will forget self in the service of their fellows, ready to subordinate their own claims, and not to seek their own advantage. Such a man was Sir Philip Manfield, who served his own generation by the will of God, and fell on sleep.

EVENING SERVICE.

In the evening Mr. Byles based his sermon on Mark xiii. 34 and 35: "It is as when a man, sojourning in another country, having left his house, and given authority to his servants, to each one his work, commanded also the porter to watch. Watch therefore: for ye know not when the lord of the house cometh." (Revised Version.) He especially dwelt on the words "to each one his work," and in the course of an essentially practical sermon said that they were suffering. God knew he suffered for the triple loss they had sustained during these few bright summer months. They would, however, be doing very wrong if in the midst of their sorrow they were not filled with holy thankfulness and joy. They thanked God for three beautiful lives which were lived amongst them for so many years, and for all the good, true, honest work which they accomplished. There was a debt due to Sir Philip Manfield no doubt from the town to which he belonged, a debt of gratitude for all the work he did and for all the long life and the integrity he lived; but they in that church owed a special debt to him and to his wife. They had that beautiful building, an edifice so solid and well built that he thought they might not question that it would last for centuries; and so beautiful as to take no unworthy place amid the beautiful churches of the county, and especially of the Valley of the Nene. But more than that. Rich men sometimes build churches, but beyond the building they leave only small blessing behind. In that church, however, they had the debt of a true and noble example, an example which had been set before the town and their community for sixty long years, an example of integrity and rectitude, of fidelity to duty, and of principle. It was said in the newspaper that Sir Philip Manfield at the time of his death or of the recent presentation, was the most popular citizen in Northampton. No doubt it was true, but he did not seek popularity. William Watson's fine line applied to him: "Prizing, not court'ing, all just men's regard." More than that, they had in their midst so long, in Lady Manfield, the example of a most gracious and kindly spirit, which always brought with it beautiful sunshine. Sir Philip left behind him an example of the true spirit of brotherhood, which in a very wonderful and marked degree ignored distinctions of social rank, and shared the burdens of those whom he rejoiced to call his brethren. They had also the example of a very living personal interest in religion, shown not only by the building of the church, but by the regularity of attendance upon the services. The debt they owed to Sir Philip and Lady Manfield was very great, such a debt as was incurred by but few churches, and honest men remembered that debts had to be paid, obligations had to be discharged. How were they to pay their debt, and show that they were worthy of the trust they had received, and the example they had witnessed? Mr. Byles devoted the remainder of his sermon to answering that question. He wanted to see that church a true home of their neighbours; he wanted the children of the neighbourhood to have a religious education given by enthusiasts in the cause; he wanted the church to make its mark upon the civil life of the town; and he wanted the voice of the church always to be heard on the side of national righteousness, on the side of freedom and truth, of humanity, and of God. If they were to accomplish any of these great objects in any degree, certainly in any large degree, they would have to remember the words of the text, to every man, not this or that particular man, but to every man his work, his appointed task.

OBITUARY.

MRS. GEORGE LAWFORDE.

ON Wednesday week there passed away, quite suddenly, Mrs. George Lawford, of Balham, in her sixty-eighth year. She was in Wales on a holiday with one of her daughters, apparently in good health, and was out for a gentle walk, when failure of the heart set in, and on her return to her hotel the end came in a very short time.

Frances Elizabeth Lawford was a daughter of the late Charles Bischoff, solicitor, whose name is honourably associated with the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Act, and her family, as well as that of her husband, was connected with the Hackney congregation. After her marriage she lived awhile at Highgate, and subsequently removed to South London, where she resided during the rest of her life. She was formerly connected with the Brixton congregation, but on the formation of the congregation at Wandsworth, her husband became its treasurer, and since his death in 1895 her son Herbert has filled the same office. She had a large family, who all survive her. Her connections were numerous, and her circle was ever-widened by her spirit of earnest well-doing. Her religious views were simple and strong, and were staunchly based upon the more conservative type of Unitarian thought; but her sympathies were kindly towards all, and her life was that of a cultured and devout Christian woman.

MISS AUBREY.

WE regret to announce the death of Miss Agnes Aubrey, which took place on Saturday week at Neath. Miss Aubrey, who was seventy-eight years of age, was the last bearer of a name that has been prominent in Swansea for some generations past. Her grandfather, the Rev. E. Aubrey, was for many years minister of the Unitarian Church in High-street, and her uncle, the late Mr. Richard Aubrey, was one of the best of Swansea's earlier mayors, who married a sister of Lord Justice James, a member of another respected Swansea family. When the late Miss Aubrey was about twelve years of age, she came with her family from Manchester to Neath, where her father was engaged in the banking business. For the past quarter of a century, however, she has lived in Swansea. During that period she has been a prominent figure in local life. She was the first secretary to the Swansea and South Wales Nursing Institute, and she took an active share in its management almost up to the time of her death. She sat on the committees of other charitable institutions as well, and, an ardent educationist, she was a member of the Committee of the Swansea Training College for Women. She was buried at Llantwit Church on Tuesday week, the funeral being strictly private.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LAST week we finished our delightful holiday time at the Lakes; I hope you all enjoyed it as much as I did. And next week there will be quite a long children's sermon, but not a dull sermon at all, which begins in Switzerland, and will give you plenty to think about. This week I want to give you these two poems, and perhaps some of you will like to learn one or other of them by heart.

The first is for the elder children, and is by Samuel Longfellow, a younger brother of the more famous poet Longfellow. The title is "Sharon Woods," and it was written in 1871.

In the woods, in the woods,
What tender twilight broods!
What flickering sunlights play
On the beech-tree's mottled gray,
As we sit this summer day
In the woods!

In the woods, in the woods,
What sacred solitudes!
The pine-tree soaring high
Spreads its hand out towards the sky
With murmured prayer and sigh,
In the woods.

In the woods, in the woods,
What low and soft preludes
Of wind the long aisles search,
Where the marble stems of birch
Are the pillars of this church
Of the woods!

In the woods, in the woods,
The brook's soft lapsing floods
Chant loud and low by turns,
Where, 'mid the plumed ferns,
The sumac's taper burns
In the woods!

In the woods, in the woods,
What sweet and gracious moods
Fill the restless heart with calm,
Till it lifts its silent psalm
With the flowers that embalm
All the woods!

The other is for the younger ones, and I should like you to think of some words that Jesus spoke, of which it may remind you.

A sparrow, with its plain brown coat—
The best it ever wore—
Has no sweet song, or cheerful note;
A chirp,—and nothing more.

Yet as it hops from bough to bough,
Or flies from tree to tree:
As if it cared not where, or how,
As restless as can be;

Or by a leaf well sheltered, sleeps,
Its head beneath its wing;
God watches, cares for it, and keeps
The thoughtless little thing.

And if He keeps the sparrow so,
Why should I ever fear?
Life has its troubles,—but I know
God's loving help is near.

EPPS'S COCOA ESSENCE.—A THIN COCOA.—The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—James Epps and Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

"A SUFFERING GOD."

A NOT very lucid article in this month's Contemporary Review, by Mr. RICHARD HEATH, deals with the question taken as its title, "But is God Silent?" The article is written in reply to the contention of Dr. ANDERSON's book, "The Silence of God," that God has made no sign since the close of the Apostolic age, and contains in passing a strong protest against the favourable reception given to that book in Evangelical circles, as represented by the Record. Mr. HEATH contends, on the contrary, that the whole course of history is eloquent of God to those who have the wisdom to understand and do not take the disappointments of a wounded egotism for a just arraignment of Divine providence. How God is found still to speak is indicated in the following passage:—

After all, miracles from a Bible point of view are not God's principal means of speaking to human beings. He speaks to the consciences of men, even in the Bible, much more frequently in the ordinary events of life, and especially in the history of their own lives and of those that have gone before them. He speaks in the same way to families, and to nations, and to the whole human race; to Churches, and to the whole of Christendom. His voices are many, and each one is adapted to the condition, mental and moral, of those to whom He speaks. He condescends in each case to their special idiosyncrasies, and talks with them in the tongue in which they were born. Man is ever changing, at times progressing, at times retrogressing. God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. And therefore there can be no real difference between the times covered by the Bible and those in which we live.

Having stated his general position,

Mr. HEATH takes a special period of history—the time of the Plantagenets, from the reign of EDWARD III. onwards—to show how both in France and England the working of the law of righteousness, in which is the living word of God, is clearly manifest. In the hundred years' war in France and the great victories of the English, won chiefly by their hardy bowmen, the French nobility suffer for their ruthless oppression of the people, and again in the Wars of the Roses the pride of the Norman conquerors is brought low, and numbers of great families are destroyed, making way for a new uprising of the people whom they had oppressed, while the Royal family itself shows a tragic record in the fate of its many branches; the nemesis of murder dogging its steps up to its final downfall.

The greater part of the article is occupied with this historical study, and in such records Mr. HEATH finds the clear witness to God. "For He has not left Himself without an interpreter to all men everywhere. The Holy Spirit speaks continually to the consciences of men, and thus as time rolls on they understand how to judge the past, and that judgment when it becomes universal and final is God's judgment." The exodus from Egypt was not more sublime, as witnessing to the Divine purpose, than the exodus of modern Christendom from the servitude of Rome, from Feudal servitude and from Negro slavery; the great uprisings of liberty in modern times are among the clearest witnesses to God. Mr. HEATH finds it impossible to understand how any religious man can argue, with such facts before him, that God is silent and gives no living sign of interest in human affairs.

And then suddenly, at the conclusion of the article, a further thought is introduced, which seems to have very little connection with all that has gone before, but which yet must vitally affect our thought of the actual relation of God to humanity. It is chiefly this further thought which has led us to refer to Mr. HEATH's argument in this place.

Not only is it shocking in Mr. HEATH's view to suppose God to be serenely indifferent to human suffering, but a true interpretation of history he regards as leading inevitably to the conclusion that God Himself suffers in all human pain. This doctrine is urged first in the words of the Abbé GRATRY, a Roman Catholic writer, and supported by the authority of the Protestant VINET; it is said to be a New Testament thought, and to be the doctrine "that answers all the doubts that arise at the sight of human suffering."

To us, we confess, the doctrine seems the very reverse of helpful, and, in fact, when traced to its foundation, to involve a denial of God.

"Our God," says the Abbé, "was made man to suffer and to die! Yes, there is the true God. He has suffered from the beginning in all who have suffered. He has been hungry in all who have hungered, and has been immolated in all and with all, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

And Mr. HEATH adds: "To know that God is suffering with it makes that suffering more awful, but it gives strength and life and hope, for we know that if God is in it, suffering is the road to victory."

To us there seems a radical difference between declaring, what is at the heart of all religious life, that God cares, that He knows all we have to suffer, and with infinite tenderness is with us in all our pain, knowing the end from the beginning and leading us through the shadows of our mortality into fuller and diviner life, and saying, on the other hand, that God Himself is the victim of suffering.

Our burden of pain is manifold. It comes to us in the sternness of retribution, and yet a sternness behind which is the FATHER's hidden tenderness, because of the love which is eternally in God, and will not suffer one living soul to be cast away. And, further, it comes to us in the sufferings of the innocent, the martyr's exultant pain, the meek patience of those who in pure unselfish love would help to redeem those who are in bondage to sin, and do not shrink from a share in their pain. But these are the sufferings of an imperfect growing life, part of a divine discipline, through which God draws us to Himself, not a part of His essential life. For if God Himself must needs suffer to redeem our human life, what mysterious Fate is that, over God Himself, compelling such surrender? Then must there be Someone else or Something else, and, as it seems to us, He ceases to be God. But the thought is abhorrent, and we do not wish to be told that in our pain God is suffering too; rather do we find our strength and hope, and the solace even of our mortal agony, in the assurance that over all the shadows there is yet this eternal joy of God, that while the FATHER's infinite tenderness is ever watching with us and holds our hand, knowing all we have to bear, and so, in a sense, suffering with us, because it is for our life, yet in the life of God there cannot be such mortal shadows, because He sees through all the pain, and Love is almighty, and therefore perfect in its joy.

In our direst need we would rather be refreshed by the thought that God does not suffer, and there is that perfect life into fellowship with which we are to be gathered, to know finally the meaning of all we have suffered and all the shadows, now often so impenetrable, of our mortality. And when we say "we would rather" we believe that to be a true instinct of the childlike heart, surrendered to the FATHER's will, and knowing that over all is the supreme and eternal Goodness—that is, God. The victory of our faith is not to be convinced that God became man to die for us, that He is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," but rather to know, with JESUS, that what we suffer is not in vain, but is all making for true life, included within the good purpose of our FATHER.

THOUGHTS FROM ITALY.

V.—FRA ANGELICO.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.,
MINISTER OF ALL SOULS' CHURCH, BELFAST.

"On two wings a man is lifted up above earthly things; that is, on simplicity and purity. Simplicity should be in the intention, purity in the affection."—Thomas à Kempis: "The Imitation of Christ," ii. 4.

A FEW miles from Florence, on one of the outlying spurs of the Apennines, commanding an extensive side view of the Arno valley, is the old hill-town of Fiesole. In Roman days it was the refuge of Catiline's conspirators—whence, says Dante, descended rebellion and treachery into the Florentine character. There was ill-will between the mountain chieftains and the merchants who dwelt at the ford of the river below; but as Florence grew into a great city the hostility died away, and Florentines built their villas on the slopes of the ancient stronghold. Here, for example, was the Villa Gherardi, where the idle company of Boccaccio's "Decameron" escaped from the plague and told their tales. But here, also, crowning the steep height, was a Dominican monastery, the home for many years of one of the greatest of Florentine painters, Fra Angelico.

Fra Angelico was born not far from Giotto's birthplace, in 1387, the year of the completion of Giotto's Bell-Tower. He had genius, and might, as a layman, have been rich; but repelled by the life of the wealthy laity, as depicted in the "Decameron"—a life, for the most part, of hawking, feasting, fighting, intrigue, and licentiousness—he resolved to be a friar, and at the age of twenty, having changed his baptismal name of Guido for that of Giovanni, or John, the name of the apostle of love, he was admitted, with a younger brother, to the monastery at Fiesole. The place was soon dear to him. Its early hours and regular habits, its plain-living and industry, its charities and studies, the keen, fresh air of the mountain, the sweet-smelling gardens, the landscape, the view of Florence with its towers, and the starlight nights, were a joy to his quiet devotional nature. Here he had a work away from the ambition and folly of the mediæval world.

But after two years, in 1409, owing to political troubles, the brotherhood left Fiesole and "wandered," residing for a time at Foligno, in the heart of Umbria, and then a few miles away at Cortona. Thus between the ages of twenty-two and thirty-one Fra Giovanni lived in the neighbourhood made sacred by St. Francis, and received deeply of his spirit. Like Cimabue, Dante, and Giotto, he felt the holy influence of Assisi. He was confirmed in his choice of poverty. Whatever he earned with his brush he gave to the poor. He had enough, he said, having little. And it is not improbable that he was led from illumination and miniature to fresco by the paintings of Giotto over St. Francis' grave.*

He had, no doubt, begun as a penman and a miniaturist; and to the end of his days he never altogether lost the minute, closely packed, and rather stunted manner of this training. His early paintings are little more than crowded groups of small heads and figures delicately drawn on white and gold as in a missal or a psalter. For instance, in the National Gallery in London, there is the predella of an altarpiece, representing the Resurrection, in which are no less than 236 microscopical portraits, each with a face and a soul of its own.† So fine and so immense is the work that one may study it for years, as I have done, and continually discover something new.

His work was rapid and unerring. As Shakespeare is said never to have blotted a sentence, so Fra Angelico is declared never to have corrected a line. The exaggeration unquestionably contains a truth. Recluse that he was, and limited in his horizon, knowing little of evil, shrinking from everything ugly and vile, nevertheless he had the vigour of genius, and his work developed magnificently.

He was the greatest of the "Giottoists," of the artists of Italy who painted for the religious instruction of the people and painted only religious themes. In the statutes of a painters' guild at Siena, drawn up in the year 1355, between the death of Giotto and the birth of Fra Angelico, we read: "Since we are teachers to unlearned men, who know not how to read, of the marvels done by the power and strength of holy religion . . . and since no undertaking, however small, can have a beginning or an end without . . . the power to do, without knowledge, and without true love of the work; and since in God every perfection is . . . united; in order that in this our calling, however unworthy it may be, we may have a good beginning and a good ending in all our works and deeds, we will earnestly ask the aid of the Divine grace and commence by a dedication to the honour of His name." If Giotto may be called the great author, Fra Angelico may be called the great finisher of this style of painting. The friar had not Giotto's experience of men, nor his power of drawing evil as a contrast to good, nor his breadth of sympathy which often found some good in evil, nor his humour, nor his delight in the homely, secular things of every day; these qualities of the master were inherited by others; but he had more than Giotto's religious intensity. I suppose the intensest religious expression in any art is in Fra Angelico's pictures. He is alone among religious painters, as Thomas à Kempis, his contemporary, is alone among devotional writers. All that is pure and gentle and refined in the monastic ideal Fra Angelico loved, and painted for us to love. To paint was for him literally

* St. Dominic, who seems to have adopted the strict vow of poverty from St. Francis, was, at any rate, as passionate for its observance as his brother saint. For St. Francis' angry protest, at the Chapter of the Mats, against any relaxing of his rule, see "The Mirror of Perfection," lxxviii. St. Dominic's last words to his disciples were: "May my malediction and that of God fall upon him that shall bring possessions to this order!" Fra Angelico, in one of his frescoes at San Marco, introduces St. Dominic holding an open book in which this sentence is written. St. Antonio, and again Savonarola, revived the rule at San Marco.

to pray. Whenever he took his brush in his hand he said a prayer. He believed absolutely in everything he painted, and believed he was inspired to do it, taking his first conceptions as divine messages, and never changing them. He that would do Christ's work, he said, must dwell with him. He never lost his temper, Vasari tells us, nor admonished but with a smile. And so deep was his love for Jesus that he could not paint the Crucifixion without tears. He was fittingly called "Angelico," as Thomas Aquinas had been before him. He lived in the heavenly world, and painted angels as no one else has done,* and multitudes of them, glorious shining creatures, flashing with brilliant hues, messengers of light, bearing joy and music on their wings to troubled humanity—beings which

"Drink love, and bathe in love, and mirror it,
And know no end thereof."

In religion Fra Angelico owed much to a friend in the monastery at Fiesole, a remarkable man three years his senior, who became Archbishop of Florence, and eventually Saint Antonino. They were at Fiesole before the wandering, met there again when it was ended in 1418, and lived in happy companionship. In the memory of the Florentines their names are inseparably associated, and we must think of them together. In 1437 Antonino, dissatisfied with the narrow scope of the work on the hill-top, started a branch of the monastery in the ruined convent of San Marco in the city below. A wealthy Florentine, Cosimo de Medici, rebuilt the convent, and Fra Angelico, following Antonino to Florence, decorated the new walls. It was a labour of love. No artist, perhaps, ever worked with greater joy than Fra Angelico, without wages, on the bare plaster of St. Mark's. In the rude, hidden cells, in some thirty of them, he painted scenes of the life of Christ for his Dominican brethren. For fifteen years, while Antonino founded or revived the principal charities in the city, and during plague time walked the streets leading an ass laden with bread and clothing for the poor, making San Marco and his own name blessed, Fra Angelico covered the walls of the monastery with pictures of Jesus and saints and angels which must give an indescribable and sacred beauty to the place so long as they exist.

These frescoes made him famous. He was called to Rome to do work for the Pope. He was engaged, too, as "one illustrious beyond other painters of Italy," to paint in the cathedral of Orvieto—a proud title he justified by a splendid picture of Christ in Judgment, supporting the globe of the universe, and attended, among other prophets, by a magnificent Moses. But his most perfect work was not done for Popes nor in cathedrals, it was reserved for the new cloisters and chapter-house of San Marco, finished in 1452. He was then sixty-five, with only three years to live, but these paintings are sublime.

Let me speak of one of them.

Do you remember Romola's visit, in George Eliot's story, to her dying brother

* Except, perhaps, Dante in verse:—

"Say who that angel is, that with such joy
Beholds our Queen, and so enamoured glows
Of Her high beauty, that all on fire he seems?
In him are summed
Whate'er of gladness and free delight
May be in spirit or in angel met."
—"Paradiso," xxxii.

in St. Mark's? She "was conducted to the door of the chapter-house in the outer cloister, whither the invalid had been conveyed, no woman being allowed permission beyond this precinct." She was engrossed with him, but was "just conscious that in the back-ground there was a crucified form rising high and pale on the frescoed wall, and pale faces of sorrow looking out from it below." This picture in the chapter-house, of the Crucifixion, is perhaps the noblest Fra Angelico ever painted.

The Cross, the Tree of Life, springing from the ground above the skull of Adam, and flowing with a stream of blood for the healing of the nations, bears the Fruit of Salvation. Right and left of him are the two thieves. Beneath, on one side, are his mother, the Magdalene, and a third Mary, the two Johns, Mark (the patron of the convent), and others; on the other side are the founders and saints of the monastic orders, including Dominic kneeling at the foot of the Cross, and behind him Francis, Thomas Aquinas, and eight more. It is admirably done. The grouping of the figures and their attitudes, the rich colouring, the fine draperies are beyond praise. But the transcendent beauty of the picture, to which all these are subordinate, is the emotion of the tragedy itself. Here is a work by a master at his best, which tells us, if we look at it carefully, what a great picture should be.

Firstly, why is the subject chosen? We cannot be in doubt. Fra Angelico did not take it to display his skill in this or that branch of his art, but because he felt it to be one of the most awful and impressive subjects that could engage the human mind, and fitting the chapter-house of a religious brotherhood.

The body of the Saviour, therefore, is not drawn, as in later and decadent times, to show knowledge of anatomy, but to express the pain and the shame of the suffering and the strength of soul which conquered the suffering. There is sufficient indication of cruelty without physical contortions, and the pain is transfigured by the love and peace in the Sufferer's face. And then, the pity and glory of the Cross are communicated to the by-standers. The "dramatic energy" of a later and lesser art—the pointing of fingers and flinging about of arms and legs, and the shouting and staring which Raffael and Michael Angelo employed to awaken interest—is entirely absent. This is not the sort of excitement Fra Angelico seeks to stir in Christian people. Of the twenty men and women whom he has gathered about the Crucified, only three raise their hands, and one of them quietly in prayer. Their feeling is restrained. There is almost complete silence; the only person in the picture who makes a noise is the impenitent thief. The mother sinks helpless in the arms of John and the Maries, but without a sound. There are no hysterics; several weep, but they turn away to hide their faces, or their tears drop silently. It is a picture of noble sorrow, which tells us how to bear sorrow. Here is the grief of strong men and women, which does not spend itself in noise and gesticulation, but is subdued and turned into resolve and power of work. "Can it really be," they seem to say, "that they have slain Him? O, the pity of it! But He is our example and redemption. We must suffer, too, with Him, and we will also save and bless."

I observed that chairs were placed before the picture where people might sit and be quiet and gather strength. Fra Angelico takes us apart from the world's much speaking and complaining. He shows us pain exalted, failure ennobled by faith, indignation repressed, motion and speech and every feature surrendered to the powers of the soul. It is all so still and so strong.

Lastly, the picture has no gloom. Instead of being wrapt in shadow, its lines obscured and colours darkened by black tempest, it is full of light.* Fra Angelico, like Giotto, loved the bright pure colours of God's world and saw the sunshine in Christian sadness. All painting that is both sincerely and deeply Christian is radiant. It knows nothing of crape and pall. And as painting loses true religiousness it loses brightness. Mr. Ruskin says that he knows of no law more severely without exception than of the connection of pure colour with profound and noble thought, and he contrasts the work of Fra Angelico with that of the irreligious Salvator Rosa. "Fra Angelico," he says, "was a man who wept often, prayed constantly, and never harboured an impure thought. His pictures are so many pieces of jewelry, the colours being perfectly pure, as various as those of a painted window, chastened only by paleness and relieved upon a gold ground. . . . Salvator Rosa was a dissipated jester and satirist, a man who spent his life in masking and revelry. But his pictures are full of horror, and their colour is for the most part gloomy and grey."

Therefore, as we look at the Crucifixion in the chapter-house of Saint Mark's convent, and see its pure crimsons and blues and rich golden yellows, and the sweet gladness which shines through its tears and pain, we are chastened rather than saddened, and are made to feel how the pure in heart see God, how a divine light shines upon them and touches their sorrow into joy.

So Fra Angelico worked in his quiet retreat, believing with a full heart in the Madonna and the saints and angels, and painting them with a fervent love. It does not matter, that we cannot believe in them as he did. The important thing, I repeat, is that he and we should believe in something noble, and should believe in it sincerely and devoutly and with joy. And here is much food for thought.

While the friar was busy in his convent, believing in the old faiths and painting in the old ways, the world outside was changing. The religion, the citizenship, the art, and the learning of Florence were undergoing a gradual transformation. The Gothic spirit, the spirit in religion of St. Francis, St. Dominic, and St. Thomas Aquinas, in poetry of Dante, and in art of Arnolfo, Giotto, Andrea Pisano, and Orcagna, was still strong, but it was finding a rival in the Classical Renaissance. Arnolfo's churches, Giotto's Campanile, Pisano's sculptures and his bronze doors on the Baptistry, Orcagna's shrine in the Or San Michele and his Loggia in the Piazza Signoria, are, excepting the round arches of the last-named, pure Italian Gothic. These were the great works in Florence when Fra Angelico was born. But from the very beginning of the fifteenth century the study of the antique made itself felt, and exerted an increasing influence. Florence continued to prosper, in spite of war and plague, and every year grew more beautiful through the labours of a succession of great artists, all of whom showed their indebtedness to the Greek and Roman. Ghiberti's bronze gates, for example, which were added to the Baptistry, the first pair in 1424 (the result of more than twenty years' work), the second in 1452 (the result of nearly thirty years' labour), and his tomb, also in bronze, of San Zanobi; Brunelleschi's vast dome on the Cathedral, which occupied him from 1417 to his death in 1446, and was not finished until 1461; Donatello's statues in bronze and wood and stone; Masaccio's frescoes in the Church of the Carmine, and the altar-pieces of Lippo Lippi, the monk who revolted against monasticism and married a nun, mark a new era in which the classical spirit, though absorbed by the Gothic, competes with it. The study of ancient temples and statuary, of the nude, of perspective, of vestments, of classical mythology, jostles with the mediæval pieties—a minor element, but increasingly formidable. So far the result was good. The breaking down of the old boundaries of art by the introduction of the heathen world meant the incoming of much besides. The everyday incident of Giotto's work received a great impulse. Portraiture, landscape, historical and domestic painting rapidly advanced. All things considered, the quattro-cento art is the greatest in the annals of Florence.

But there was another and a dangerous side to this movement. Vasari was right from his point of view, as an Italian, as an inheritor of the language and culture of ancient Rome, in speaking of the Gothic art as foreign and harsh, and of the revived classical style as "the good old manner." Renaissance architecture and painting and rules of poetry are excusable in Italy and to an extent in all the Romance countries, however inexcusable in Teutonic lands. We may forgive St. Peter's on the Tiber, though St. Paul's and Whitehall are unpardonable on the Thames. Nevertheless it is true in Italy, as everywhere else, that the Renaissance art was not as all previous arts had been, a national development. It was an imitation of something dead by the educated and the wealthy. The temples of Greece and Rome, the Byzantine, Lombard, Norman, and Gothic churches had been simply the crowning forms of domestic styles of architecture, exalted specimens of the architecture in wood and stone of the dwellings of the people. But the Renaissance cathedrals and palaces were in no sense whatever developments of the house and cottage; they were an aristocratic hobby and fashion, alien from the people, and insulting to the people, the sign of class—classy as well as classical. So with the paintings and sculptures of Homeric and Virgilian themes; they were for a class, and not, as Giotto's frescoes had been, for the poorest as well. Besides, this Renaissance work was a revival of heathendom. Fra Angelico might have asked, as possibly he did, "Where will this paganism lead? What if Venus and the Graces shall supersede the Virgin and the Angels?" There was no fear of that in his day. The influence of St. Francis was too strong. But the extension of the knowledge of Greek, especially by the flight of Greek scholars after the fall of Constantinople in 1453, two years before Fra Angelico's death, the interest in Plato and heathen philosophy, set men questioning, and belief in the Madonna and much else was being undermined. And this decline of faith was going on at the very moment when Florence and other Italian cities were passing into the power of wealthy families and losing their ancient liberty and public spirit. I will not say that Fra Angelico foresaw what was coming, though I believe he felt estranged from his time; but there must have been earnest souls, themselves in perplexity, who asked, "What will the Church do? Will it adapt itself to new conditions? Who will be the new St. Francis and St. Aquinas to give Christianity a fresh impulse and re-shape its teaching? And if they arise, will they prevail over dogma, or will dogma prevail over them?" Already there must have been thinkers anticipating Savonarola and the Reformation.

So, my friends, I close this sermon with the truth which cannot be too often repeated—that Religion cannot stand still. It is never final. Its form continually alters. It needs new expression in every age, if it is to be a sincere and devout belief to that age. It must perpetually embody the thought and experience of the new time, if it is to be a living power in that time. And looking round on our modern world with its many paganisms and imitations and its deeply rooted class selfishness, I think our great need is something to worship, something which we may love as simply and devoutly as Fra Angelico loved the Madonna and the saints in Heaven.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.—IV.

At the end of the twelfth century the Early English style of architecture was developed from the Norman which preceded it. The transition was gradual, like all transitions in the natural growth of any art, as distinguished from the occasional revolutions or artificial reactions which take place from time to time in art and literature, as in politics and religion. There is no definite break between the two styles. Nevertheless the transition having been completed we find the change is sufficiently marked to strike even the least observant eye. The nave of the cathedrals of Durham, Peterborough, or Hereford, and the nave of Salisbury or Lincoln, appear to have nothing in common as to style and artistic appearance. We may have passed gradually from one phase to the other, but the two phases are quite distinct.

This led to an early classification of English Architecture under two heads—(1) "Circular" or "Saxon," and (2) "Pointed" or "Gothic"; and the latter was subdivided into "Early," "Middle," and "Late." But there is no good reason for separating "Circular" from "Pointed," or "Saxon" from "Gothic." The term Gothic is often objected to on the very reasonable ground that the Goths had nothing to do with it. The word was at first applied to our native architecture as one of contempt, by those who wished to re-establish the Greek and Roman style of architecture in its place. But the beauty of the building has triumphed over the bad name, and whatever other associations we may have with the word Goth, "Gothic Architecture" now suggests beauty of form, excellence and delicacy of workmanship, and simple grandeur, or harmonious complexity of design. Gothic Architecture, then, may now be accepted as the term covering the whole of the native ecclesiastical architecture in Central and Northern Europe, from its first origin to its decline in the sixteenth century.

And the English School from the Norman Conquest to the fifteenth century is better understood when regarded as one passing through four stages, than when it is divided into two periods of the round arch and the pointed arch, and then the latter subdivided again. The first two of the four stages we have already spoken of as the "Norman" and the "Early English." The third, which we now reach, is known as the "Decorated." The fourth and last as "Perpendicular."

These last two terms are derived from the nature of the ornament or decoration found in the buildings generally, but more especially in the window tracery. The earliest window tracery consists of figures of perfectly simple geometrical lines, unbroken by what is called foliation, i.e., subsidiary curves of trefoils, quatrefoils, &c., and points or "cusps" that are formed between the foils. These foils and cusps appear in Early English work, but they are at first distinct from the general design and workmanship. They are attached to it, and might be separated from it without affecting its completeness in itself. In the Decorated style they become an integral part of the tracery.

Another characteristic of the decorated tracery is that the lines of the moulding flow into one another. In the early geometrical tracery each figure is complete and separate in its outline. If there are two arches with a circle resting between them, the lines of the stonework of the arches are distinct, and the circle is a separate complete stone circle resting between them. It could be taken away without affecting the arches. But in the Decorated period the moulding of the arch and the moulding of the circle are for some little distance identical, and neither could be removed without breaking the other. Thus the line of the arch flows as it were into the line of the circle.

This flowing of the lines of geometrical tracery from the arch to the figure above led most naturally to the abandonment of geometrical figures, and the filling of the whole window with varied figures formed by flowing lines of tracery—that is to say, curves which are not segments of circles. It is impossible to describe these, as we described the East window of Lincoln, without any drawing; but it is hardly necessary to do so, they may be seen in all parts of the country and in some part or other of almost every cathedral. The two finest examples are the East window of Carlisle and the West window of York. Upon the question, Which of these is the most perfect? there will, probably always be a difference of opinion; but there can be no question between them and any other, York is, perhaps, the most elaborate, but Carlisle the most satisfying and restful in its harmony of parts and simpler beauty. There is not a line in the tracery or a figure formed by it that is ugly or offensive.

This departure from geometrical forms opened the way to infinite variety of design; in many buildings of this period every window is different from all the others, and a careful observation of the windows of parish churches of the period will afford a constant succession of new and beautiful designs. When the vast number is considered it is marvellous how few are defective in form or proportion either in the lines of the tracery or the figures formed by it.

With this elaboration of window tracery there is a contemporary elaboration of ornament in other parts of the buildings. The carved foliage of the capitals is deeper and more clearly cut. In Southwell Minster, for example, the foliage which belongs to this period has almost the delicacy of wood-carving; and here, as in many other examples of the same period, it is less conventional and more natural than that of the earlier ages. Conventional ornament by no means entirely disappears. There is a small ornament known as the ball-flower, an imitation, perhaps, of the golden ball ranunculus, which is as characteristic of this period as the dog-tooth of the Early English, or the zigzag or cable of the Norman. There is a well-known window at Leominster in Herefordshire which has these ball flowers set thickly along every line of its jambs, arch, mullions, and tracery.

The advance now made in the art of carving led naturally to a great increase in the number of statues and carved heads in and about the churches. The west front of Lichfield Cathedral, for instance, is covered with decorative work, and has one hundred and thirteen niches for statues surmounted by canopies. All the statues but five were destroyed at the time of the Reformation or subsequently, and almost the whole of the work now seen on the west front of Lichfield is modern.

The elaborate care which was devoted to the decoration of various parts of the churches in the fourteenth century, found scope also in the erection of tombs of similar design and style. In many churches are to be found canopies, in which the Decorated style is at once recognised, over monuments belonging to this age.

In parish churches we rarely find the same elaborate workmanship in capitals that the cathedrals of this age show. The piers and arches are often remarkably plain, the piers being simple, with round, or hexagonal, capitals, and the arches without moulding. It would seem as if the whole artistic energy and the possible expenditure of labour were devoted to the windows and doorways and other subsidiary parts of the building, and the effect of these is indeed heightened in the smaller churches by the absence of decoration elsewhere.

THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR,—From time to time I see in THE INQUIRER references to the troubles in the Transvaal, but I am surprised to find that one side is taken as the only true side, while the cruel tyranny to which our countrymen out there have to submit is deliberately ignored. The first paragraph in last week's issue does not hesitate to impute unworthy motives to those who approve of the action of our rulers in trying to redress the grievances of the oppressed. I submit, therefore, that if Transvaal troubles must be referred to in THE INQUIRER, then both sides should be fairly represented. It may be that those who sympathise with the Uitlanders have good and weighty reasons for doing so, and are quite as honest in their intentions and actions as those who engage in special pleading for Mr. Kruger and the Boers.

F. T. REED.

Moretonhampstead, Sept 4.

[There has been no word written in THE INQUIRER implying that the grievances of the Uitlanders are not very serious, and ought not to be redressed, nor have any unworthy motives been imputed to those who agree with us in that opinion.—ED. INQ.]

SIR,—It would be a satisfaction to some or many of your readers, if, instead of simply offering them (as in your last number) the ipse dixit of Mr. Frederic Harrison in his tirade against the policy of the English Government, you would give them some evidence for the foul accusations which he brings, and you repeat, against that policy. Are we called upon to believe that such men as Lord Salisbury and Mr. Chamberlain, to say nothing of Lord Kimberley, Sir A. Milner, and other leaders, in seeking to protect Englishmen in the Transvaal from the tyranny and bad faith of the Boers, are lending themselves to be the mere tools of "noisy, arrogant, and trading groups of men, organising and intriguing for their own ends"? Are we to believe that the Power "calling itself paramount is basely claiming and aiming" to seize what it can, and "to coerce those who refuse to be despoiled"? Such is the charge of Mr. F. Harrison against the English Government. I believe it to be a false and groundless charge. At any rate, where is the evidence in support of it? So far as THE INQUIRER is concerned, there is none. Pray Mr. Editor, be quite candid, and let us at least have both sides of the question. And I add, let us in reason believe that the English Government and its agents in South Africa have better means of judgment as to what the case demands than Mr. Harrison or those one-sided people who, with him, are so ready to abuse our Government for trying to do what they believe and probably well know to be just and right in most difficult and trying circumstances.

G. VANCE SMITH.

[We quoted the passages from Mr. Harrison's open letter to Lord Salisbury last week, because he is a man whose public utterances deserve attention, and because we have shared very painfully the fear he expresses lest this country should be involved in war over the Transvaal troubles. There is, so far as we are aware, no difference of opinion as to the necessity for the redress of Uitlander grievances; but such wrongs are not to be righted by a greater iniquity, such as we hold that war would be. Since last week, and up to the time of writing this note, the reports of the progress of negotiations seems to be more reassuring; but we cannot pretend to the confidence Dr. Vance Smith expresses in those who are at present responsible for the direction of the Colonial policy of this country. Dr. Vance Smith asks for both sides of the question: they are to be found abundantly in the daily newspapers, and in the matter of war and rumours of war, with which we have been chiefly concerned, we have expressed our opinion upon them.—ED. INQ.]

We have also received some notes on this subject from Mr. Tero, of Edinburgh, too extensive to be given in full; but the following seem to us to be the most cogent, in reference to our notes of last week:—

(1.) The conviction that a military conflict between the Boers and ourselves is immeasurably preferable to our submission to their perfidy and tyranny, or to our renunciation of British suzerainty over the Transvaal cannot rightly be considered a symptom of moral weakness. It may possibly indicate even a correct appreciation of the value of facts.

(2.) Our practically uniform experience of the character and conduct of the present rulers of the so-called South African Republic belies the hypothesis that mere argument and persuasion, i.e., diplomacy unaccompanied by at least menace of war, will ever wrest from these self-seeking politicians fidelity to their promises or that moderate instalment of justice to the misnamed Uitlanders which is claimed by Mr. Chamberlain and Sir A. Milner.

(3.) There are, unfortunately, very powerfully "hidden and sinister forces" antagonistic to the preservation of peace—namely, the avarice of President Kruger and other Boer leaders, whose enormous gains from the infamous dynamite monopoly are imperilled by projects of reform; the bribery prevalent among Government officials, Members of Parliament, and others in the Transvaal; the despotic disposition of the Boers, and their deep-rooted hatred of Britons in general, and peculiarly of those who have hitherto endured their insolence, extortion, and cruelty.

(4.) In conclusion, I should like to remark, in reply to Mr. F. Harrison, that although Mr. Kruger and his colleagues have repeatedly sought to violate their most serious pledges to us, we have scrupulously observed our own to them; spoliation and coercion are favourite pastimes of the Boer oligarchy which reigns at Pretoria; and no other great Power occupying our own position would have tolerated with such remarkable patience as that exhibited by successive British Governments, the vagaries, the discourtesy, and the iniquity of the administrators of the Transvaal Republic.

TORQUAY WELCOME MEETING.

ON Monday evening a meeting was held in Unity Hall to welcome the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, the newly-appointed minister, and the occasion was taken to hold during the day a conference of the Devon ministers.

The chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. BROOKE HERFORD, of London, who was supported by the Revs. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham; T. B. Broadrick, of Bridgewater; E. S. Anthony, M.A., of Poole; F. T. Reed, of Moretonhampstead; J. S. Mathers, of Plymouth; J. Barron, of Tavistock, and A. E. O'Connor.

Dr. BROOKE HERFORD said that it had been his pleasure and privilege to worship with the friends at Unity Hall year after year, until he seemed to have some sort of part heritage with Torquay and a little place in the permanent life, work, and thought of the community. He felt that they were now at a very interesting and encouraging time in the history of their movement. The fact was that there were nowadays so many churches that were opening to the great thoughts for which Unitarians had so long stood alone, that to a great many people it seemed as if they could hold those thoughts quite as well in other churches as in theirs. He did not think that they could do so with quite the same openness and freedom, but, at the same time, Unitarians were glad to think that they could hold them at all, and that there existed so much liberty of thought. Although they did not see very great advance in looking back upon fifty years of work, still there was a certain deepening of religious life, a certain knowledge of their work, a greater leavening of whatever truth they had, and more sympathy with that truth in the other churches of the time. It had been much the same with the line of religious progress and Christian reform all through the generations. The majority had always gone the broader way, and not in the way which led to the light of the New Testament. But there had always been a small body of those who had held together for freedom and truth, and for the more spiritual thought of Christianity. They had never succeeded numerically as ecclesiastical bodies, but they did not start for the success of ecclesiastical bodies; they started in order to have the success of drawing the world to the nobler, sublimer thoughts of religion which Christ had given them. The Christian Church of to-day was as different from the Christian Church a century ago as it could possibly be. They did not claim that the change had been all their doing, but some of the great thoughtful onlookers were beginning to say it. Robertson, of Brighton, said it, and Ian Maclaren had owned that the greatest thought of the New Testament was the thought of the Fatherhood of God, and that that thought had been lost to the Christian Church since the second century until the time of Channing. People were now endeavouring to persuade them that they had done their work so effectually that it was practically accomplished, and that they might now lay down their arms. There was, however, more to be done beyond teaching men the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God. There was the teaching to men a reasonable, thoughtful view of the Bible, there was the clearing away of the thought of God as a stern Majesty Who would condemn the majority of His creatures to eternal death. In the days to come, some other Ian Maclaren or Robertson would point to some other part of reformed Christianity and attribute it to the influence of Unitarians. The stars in their courses were working on their side. The trend of thought of the day in the newspaper office and in the street was in the direction of simple views of religion, such as culminated in the Fatherhood of God and in the simple Christianity of Jesus Christ.

Mr. O'CONNOR returned thanks. The small congregation in Torquay had already extended to him a most kind welcome. He felt that, whatever difficulties were inherent to the situation, difficulties which would become more and more apparent as time went on, they would always stand together as working for the same object, as bound together by the ties, not necessarily of a uniformity of belief, but of a union, of spirit, working together for worship in spirit and in truth, and the promotion of the religion of Jesus as they understood it.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD delivered a stirring address. As Unitarians, they had to consider how it was that their churches did not flourish as much as they desired them to do. They must recognise that they did not seem to have that measure of success that they saw on the part of the orthodox churches. Why was it that they did not achieve that success which they, with their beautiful, simple, reasonable faith desired, and that they ought to have. He had spent a very instructive Sunday at Torquay in visiting forms of service different to his own. In the morning he visited a High church, and spent a most instructive two hours there. They had first of all morning prayer, when psalms were sung to Gregorian chants in which no one could join. Then followed a simple sermon, after which a large portion of the congregation left. Immediately after morning prayer came the celebration of Holy Eucharist—they called it a celebration; what they meant he did not exactly know. The service that followed was a most impressive one, and at moments the congregation thrilled to functions that were going on. The services culminated in the consecration of the bread and wine on the part of the officiating priest. The words were uttered to the accompaniment of solemn music, and the priest at the altar uplifted the bread and wine which had been turned into the Body and Blood of God. Then followed the solemn tolling of a bell which marked the culmination of the service, when God was made to appear on the altar by the hands of the priest. There were many thrilling moments in the service if they could believe it, they to whom it appeared as mummery and superstition of the grossest kind. To those who believed in it, it was a moment of the most solemn influence. What was the secret of that gathering and the influence that the service possessed? and was there anything that they could learn from it? Had it any significance, any message for them? The answers that had been given were quite inadequate. Some people regarded such a service as a kind of amusement to which people flocked. Others explained it on the ground of some kind of æsthetic thrill which it produced, but both these explanations were inadequate. The people who attended the services were in dead earnest, and it was to them a great reality. The central idea which it conveyed, he thought, was that God appeared to them on the altar. Let them as Unitarians proclaim the broad, Catholic, universal doctrine that God was present everywhere. The whole earth was His temple, every true heart His altar; He was present in every blade of growing corn, in every star that glittered, in every lily of the valley. He had his dwelling not simply in temples, but in the Light of setting suns,

And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man.

Where was the holiest place that night in Torquay? It might be where the young man was battling with a sore heart against temptation; it might be where the mother was anxiously waiting for her erring son; or in the workhouse ward, where a poor soul was passing from death to life. Let them proclaim that broad Catholic doctrine of the ever-present God. Mr. Wood criticised the evangelical view of "saving grace," and was followed by the Rev. J. Barron, Mr. Reed, and Mr. Anthony.

THE GREAT HUCKLOW HOLIDAY HOME.

THE STOCKPORT PARTY.

THE long-expected week in camp at the "Old Hall" is, as far as our school is concerned, "a thing of the past," but it will long remain in the minds of those who formed our party as a pleasant holiday spent together. On behalf of our party, I feel bound to thank the M.D.S.S.A., and especially its hardworking committee, for the opportunity afforded us of spending such an enjoyable holiday in the country, and I trust that much good will be done towards forming a deeper interest in school life amongst our scholars and teachers alike.

There were thirty-five, all told, that set out for Great Hucklow on Aug. 12, amongst whom was our much-respected senior female teacher, Miss Hirst, and everybody seemed in high glee with the anticipation of a jolly time in store for them. It was not convenient for all to leave before midday, so we separated into two groups, and we found this answered very well, the first group arriving at the "Hall" at three o'clock, followed by the second two hours later. None of us will ever forget that Saturday night. When "the clock struck the hour for retiring," we found, on examining our beds, that some mischievous person or persons had been there before us, and after we had extracted the thorns and nettles that were hidden there, we at last managed to fall asleep.

Sunday was spent in a few short walks, and in attending evening service in the little chapel, which was much enjoyed.

The remainder of the week up to Friday was spent in excursions to Chatsworth, Haddon, Castleton, The Winnats, Eyam, Grindleford Bridge, and Tideswell, and in rambles to Fairy Glen, a pretty little glen within one and a-half miles of Great Hucklow. Some excellent specimens of ferns were taken from this glen, and large quantities of wild flowers were also gathered during these rambles. Games at cricket, football, and rounders were also indulged in during the week. On Friday it rained all day, forcing us to stay indoors, but as we had brought a good many indoor games the day passed pleasantly, and was brought to a conclusion by a musical evening in the school-room belonging to the chapel. A few showers fell on Saturday morning, but did not prevent a few of the older members venturing out to collect more flowers and ferns to take home, and at two o'clock we had just finished packing our boxes. With one last look at the "Hall," we turned our faces homewards, carrying with us tender recollections of a happy week just ended.

The Rev. B. C. Constable and family spent the week in the village, and visits were paid us during the week by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, of Liverpool; Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Nantwich; Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester; Rev. J. J. Shaw, of Newchurch; and Rev. William Rose, of Great Hucklow. W. B.

THE WILLERT STREET PARTY.

As it is probable that our party of children from Willert-street Domestic Mission will be the last to occupy the Home this season, and as it differed somewhat from those who had been before, a few words on our experience may be useful. Twenty-five (teachers and scholars) went on Aug. 26, and, notwithstanding unsettled weather, the holiday was greatly enjoyed. The children were some of the poorest, gathered from one of the most thickly-populated parts of Manchester, where there are no trees or grass, but flagstones and small grimy cottages.

Unlike the former parties, we did not make Great Hucklow the centre from which to visit the many beautiful and interesting places which surround it, but to imbibe "the freshest, purest, and most bracing air to be found in England." (These are words from one who was visiting the place, and who had previously been minister there for nine years.)

We found great advantage in being able to give our scholars their meals altogether, and sleeping them all under one roof; this gave us the opportunity to inspire them with the idea of good behaviour, which is much lacking amongst most of these poor and neglected children. The teachers, too, had a good opportunity of becoming better acquainted with them, and bringing to bear their influence which is so necessary to make Sunday-school work effective.

We made the devotional services an important part of our arrangements. Every morning at nine o'clock all were gathered in the chapel when, without any other preliminary, a portion of Scripture was read with exposition, followed by a short prayer, a hymn, and the benediction. This was repeated in exactly the same order every evening, the service never exceeding half an hour. "The children were remarkably attentive;" was the testimony of two ministers and some friends who attended these meetings. Altogether it is felt that lasting good has been done through this holiday. As to the future, I would echo the words of J. J. S. in this week's INQUIRER: "If our experience goes for anything, the establishment of a permanent holiday home at Great Hucklow would be a great boon to the schools in the Manchester district," and other districts too, why not?—not only for the scholars of our schools, but for our tired workers and those out of health through being compelled to live in bad air and uncongenial surroundings the year through. And then what a splendid place it would be as a club or institute for the village in the winter: and to judge by what has already been done at such a small cost, there seems little doubt of it paying its own way when once it has been well established. NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bury.—Preaching in Bank-street Chapel last Sunday morning the Rev. J. C. Odgers told the story of Bishop Colenso and his broadening views of truth concerning the Bible. His conclusions set aside the conventional views, and penetrated to the permanent spiritual truth enshrined in the writings of prophet, sage and poet. These were not spoiled because here and there was to be found an historical blunder or unscientific statement. The foundations of religious faith were fixed in God and in the soul of man, not in the fallible records of man's thoughts about God. Those results, on account of which sentence of deposition was pronounced on Colenso, had since been accepted by all thinking men in his own Church, and in the Free Churches too. They were not often openly proclaimed for fear lest mischief might ensue in church and chapel, but privately they were accepted. The mass of men took time to follow in the footsteps of the pioneers. In the Church of England Bishop Thirlwall, Dean Stanley, Dean Farrar, Professors Max Müller, Hatch, Cheyne, Sayce, &c., with Bishop Colenso, led the way. In the Free Churches there were men of solid learning and independent thought whose influence was clearly to be traced in the broadening sympathies of the Christian World newspaper, and in the chorus of applause which had welcomed the appearance of the Polychrome Bible. The world moved slowly, but still it moved. The supposed necessity of trying to reconcile every statement, and of solemnly accepting as fact every recorded miracle in the Old Testament, had disappeared; a larger knowledge had brought a wider liberty. It was Jesus who said: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Cullompton.—An harvest thanksgiving service was held on Friday, Sept. 1, when two able addresses were delivered by the Revs. T. B. Broadrick and F. H. Vaughan, B.A. The chapel was profusely decorated with corn, fruit, vegetables, and flowers, and Mr. E. K. Vaughan presided at the organ. The singing was also accompanied by an orchestral band, Mr. Vaughan singing a solo and Mr. Roberts giving a violin solo. The meeting was preceded by a public tea, to which about fifty sat down. The services were continued on Sunday, Sept. 3, when the Rev. F. H. Vaughan addressed the children in the morning on "The Parable of the Sower," preaching in the evening to a good congregation on "Our Daily Task." A solo was sung at both services on Sunday by Mr. E. K. Vaughan, who again presided at the organ, the band also accompanying the singing. A collection was taken on Sunday evening on behalf of the Royal Devon and Exeter Hospital. The Essex Hall Hymnal was used at the services, replacing the Hymns for the Christian Church and Home, of which the copies previously used are worn out.

Guildford.—These radiant summer months have not passed away without delightful days for our younger members. By the kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Ellis the Sunday-school treat was held in the beautiful grounds at Somersbury. Now that the winter approaches the literary society has been resuscitated, Mr. George Taylor, J.P., being the president for the coming year; and Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., C.C., the vice-president. During July and August the members of the congregation have been very glad indeed and very grateful to welcome to the pulpit the Rev. Ellison A. Voysey, of Reading, the Rev. J. J. Marten, of Horsham, and the Rev. Chynoweth Pope, of Lewisham. Arrangements have been made for certain structural improvements in the church building.

Horsham (Presentation).—On Saturday, Sept. 2, a deputation from the congregation and the Sunday-school waited on the Rev. J. J. and Mrs. Marten, on the occasion of their silver wedding, and presented them with an illuminated address, accompanied with a case of silver fish knives and forks, a handsome silver-mounted centre-piece for cake and preserves, and a beautiful bouquet of white flowers.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—The Rev. R. A. Armstrong preached again on Sunday morning, the subject of his sermon being "The Lessons of the Icebergs." At present it is arranged that Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Cobden Smith shall officiate alternately at the services.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—The September Calendar contains the following pastoral letter from the Rev. F. Allen:—"The date and our Motto remind us that, though we may shortly be saying in the language of the Old Book, 'The harvest is past, and the summer is ended, yet we are not saved' from the duties imposed on us by our profession of religion, for before us are those months of Autumn and Winter which for us are the work-time of the year; therefore I invite everyone, whatever their age or station in life, connected with or interested in our Church, our Mission, and their various institutions to aid and help in some way, the work we have to perform in this neighbourhood and district. There is not one of you but can do something, and give something: time, sympathy, work, or means, with which to advance the ends we have in view as a congregation of Christian workers—namely, 'The worship of God, and the service of man,' for we must remember that 'we are God's fellow-workers,' and that work is worship. If we are sincere in our desire to promote the extension of His Kingdom on earth, it cannot be done by hands folded in idleness, but only by earnest and faithful doing. In many ways can help be rendered: a glance at the pages of our monthly calendars will indicate what are the claims made upon each of us, for do not forget all can do something; individually it may seem small, or even trifling, but collectively very different will the results be. Workers and helpers, as well as worshippers, are wanted in our Sunday Services, our Sunday-school, our Provident Bank, the Mothers' Meeting, District Visiting, our Working Party, our Temperance Societies for the Young and Adults, the Young Women's, Girls', and Boys' Clubs, &c., Happy Evenings for the Children, and for Men and Women, &c. Therefore I say to you—

'Live for something; be not idle;

Look about thee for help;

Sit not down to useless dreaming—

Labour is the sweetest joy.

Folded hands are very weary,

S-l-fish hearts are never gay;

Life for thee hath many duties:

Active be, then, while you may.'

'Arise, therefore, and be doing, and the Lord be with thee.'

Mansfield (Resignation).—The Rev. H. S. Perrie, M.A., has resigned the ministry of the Old Meeting-house.

Moneyrea (Presentation).—On Tuesday evening, 29th ult., the Rev. R. Lyttle was entertained to tea by the lady members of his congregation, and presented by them with a Bank order and a handsome volume bound in morocco containing the list of subscribers. The chair was taken by Mrs. Gibson, sen., of Heathfield. Mrs. Margaret McCulloch explained the inception of the presentation, and testified to the unanimity, enthusiasm, and liberality with which it was supported. After an address by Mr. A. K. Stewart, Mrs. James Bennett made the presentation, and expressed the affectionate regard which the congregation entertained towards Mr. Lyttle, and their high appreciation of his work as their minister. The Rev. R. Lyttle suitably replied, after which the Rev. R. M. King addressed the meeting. Songs and recitations followed, and a pleasant evening was closed by the singing of a hymn and the benediction.

Rochdale.—A "Roll of Honour" has been placed in the Sunday-school, the gift of Mr. Wright Wilcock, "as a testimony to a good example." The tablet is of fumed oak, with lettering in gold. It already bears the names of seven scholars as winners of gold medals for seven years' complete attendance since 1889, and thirty-four names of winners of silver medals for three years' complete attendance during the same period, covered by the ministry of the Rev. T. P. Spedding. A scheme has been adopted for heating the church by means of low pressure pipes, together with an arrangement by which the air, entering by two main shafts from outside, may be heated when required, and introduced cold during the summer months. The work is to be carried out at once.

Scarborough.—The sale of work held last week in the schoolroom of Westborough Church was in every way successful, thanks to the efforts of the congregation, the presence and support of non-resident Unitarians, and the kindly interest of many non-Unitarian residents. Mr. J. C. Rickett, the Borough Member, opened the sale on the first day. After luncheon, of which about forty ladies and gentlemen partook he made a very interesting speech, in the course of which he said that he wished to show his sympathy with every form of religious belief which made for the good of the community. It was now recognised that Christianity could not find its unity in formulated doctrine, nor indeed in ceremonial, as recent events had shown. He who followed the commandments of Christ might be more imbued with his spirit than another, who, holding more orthodox views as to his person, fell short in fulfilling his purpose. The hearts of some disciples burned within them as they talked in the way with the unknown companion. On the other hand, there were those who intellectually recognised him, but out of whose sight he vanished at the moment of recognition. The speaker did not wish to minimise the serious difference in creed which separated the Unitarian body from other Christian believers, but on this occasion he desired to call more particular attention to the opportunity for agreement and co-operation. The Unitarians were not a cohesive religious society like the Presbyterians or Methodist Churches. He understood that in the place where they were gathered there was nothing to prevent a minister and congregation in the future holding and teaching a more complex doctrine of the Godhead. They did not worship the creed of yesterday, and in like manner were prepared to set aside the creed of to-day if the truth widened about them. The Unitarian Churches witnessed to the presence of the Spirit of Truth in the world and of absolute fidelity to that Spirit. They also witnessed to the unity of the Godhead, a doctrine which, although forming an essential part of the Catholic faith, sometimes fell into shadow. In these days of religious mysticism, in which many, acknowledging an intelligent power in the universe, doubted its development into personality, and regarded it as altogether foreign to human thought and ways, they might surely acknowledge as belonging to the Christian Brotherhood, a Church which professed the gracious Fatherhood of the Creator, and the divine Message of the Son of Man. In conclusion, Mr. Rickett invited the Unitarian Churches to co-operate more freely in those moral and philanthropic reforms in which the whole Christian world was interested. He trusted that the atmosphere in which they worked would be charged with a kindlier sympathy, and that Unitarian Churches would not remain in isolation as cultured and select societies, but grow into a spiritual and ethical power for the good of the world. On the second day Mrs. Marillier opened the sale, and on each occasion there was a good attendance, and brisk business. At the close of the third day the gross receipts amounted to £171, including donations, and the expenses will not exceed £6. On Sunday, Sept. 3, the anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. P. H. Wickstead, M.A., who preached most impressively upon "Love and Eunoe" in the morning and "Freedom and Service" at night.

Swansea.—On Sunday a sermon was preached in the Unitarian Church by the minister, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, in memory of Mr. Rowland and Miss Aubrey. The extent of our loss as a Church was pointed out, and the noble work which both had accomplished in the cause of education—charity work and liberal religion. Their devotion to the truth had been unwavering throughout their lives, and they never bent the knee to what was popular if it struck against what they considered to be right. When liberal religion is able to produce such characters as Mr. Rowland and Miss Aubrey, it is too precious a treasure to be lost. It was pointed out how both had stamped indelibly their influence on the towns of Swansea and Neath, and many of its charities and educational institutions in the two towns owe in a large measure their origin and efficiency to their united efforts.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Court-martial at Rennes, brought to a close last Saturday, has added infamy to infamy by its condemnation of Captain Dreyfus. The shameless tradition of the army and the surgings of blind and venomous passion prevailed in this monstrous pretence of a trial once more to condemn an innocent man, although two brave and honest officers were found among the seven, who dared to give their voices for acquittal; and beside the noble and pathetic figure of Alfred Dreyfus himself must ever be remembered in this tragic affair, his true-hearted advocates and, above all, the chivalrous Picquart. These and others who stood by them bear witness that there may be hope for France even in this dark hour of disgrace; and while it is natural to an indignation which can find no adequate expression to incline to such a tangible protest as the boycott of the coming Exhibition, which is being widely advocated, we must be careful not to be betrayed ourselves into injustice, which would only serve further to inflame evil passions. No such objection can, however, be taken to the warmest and most widespread expressions of confidence and admiration and sympathy which may be offered by our people to Dreyfus and his devoted wife. The end of the affair is, of course, not yet. The Government and the Supreme Civil Court have still their word to speak, though even the President's "pardon," which has been suggested, would seem a fresh insult. But whatever the development of events, though Dreyfus himself should succumb, as is sometimes sadly feared, to the terrible strain of what he has to endure, the Court-martial has already established in the judgment of the civilised world on which side truth and honour are to be found.

WE are thankful to note in the moderate tone of the last British despatch to the Transvaal, in reply to the Boer note of Sept. 2, a good prospect that the matters in dispute may now be brought to a reasonable issue. Perhaps before these words are printed the reply of the Boer Government may have been received, which we earnestly hope will be an acceptance, so that further conference and the moderating counsels of the friends of peace in South Africa may finally prevail to prevent a terrible calamity. In another column will be found some further letters on this subject, and we desire to call special attention to that from Mr. John Dendy.

THE annual meeting of the British Association opened on Wednesday at Dover, when the President, Sir Michael Foster, delivered his address, which was occupied with a retrospect of the century, showing the immense advances of scientific knowledge, dwelling naturally on the revolution of thought caused by the publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species," and referring to what has been gained in the knowledge of electricity. A strong plea was also offered for the worth of scientific education, not only for the sake of what science adds to life, but for the training of mental power.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD's letter in The Times of Sept. 5, to which we briefly referred last week, is this week dealt with by the Guardian in a leading article, with the inevitable conclusion of non possumus. The same Church, the Guardian urges, cannot include those who accept and those who repudiate one and the same central object of worship, which in the Anglican view is the incarnate God.

What Mrs. Ward is concerned with is, to put it shortly, the truth of the Incarnation. She holds that "it is really no question of faith or unfaith at all"; but she cannot be using the words in the sense in which Christians are accustomed to use them. With us faith means faith in Christ, the Son of God, the faith which Mrs. Ward puts on one side in spite of her eloquent and earnest words about the life and death of Christ as the embodiment of the fundamental Christian principle of "dying to live." As one of her supporters in the columns of The Times perceives, her attempt is a hopeless one, for it is nothing less than an attempt to include Unitarian opinion within the limits of the doctrines of the English Church. Regarded from our point of view, it is an attempt to set aside, or to declare indifferent, the fundamental and essential doctrine of our faith.

Lord Halifax also writes to the Guardian expressing his disappointment in Mrs. Ward. He had hoped from some passages in "Helbeck of Bannisdale" that "Robert Elsmere" had passed away and that Mrs. Ward was on the road back to the true fold. Needless to say, Lord Halifax is not ready to tolerate "Socinianism" within the limits of the English Church.

WE hear through our friend Mr. Pro-motho loll Sen, who was recently at Manchester College, Oxford, that Mr. Brojendra Nath Seal was to sail from Bombay on Aug. 26 for Marseilles, by the s.s. Ballarat, and will proceed thence to London. He is to spend about a fortnight in England before going to Rome, to attend the Congress of Orientalists. Mr. Brojendra Nath is a member of the Brahma Somaj, and is at present Principal of the Victoria College, Cooch Behar, in Northern Bengal. He is distinguished among his fellow-countrymen for depth of thought and the comprehensiveness of his culture, and may be assured of a very cordial welcome in this country.

THE Special Services Committee, in connection with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, announce that it has been arranged for the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., LL.D., to preach at Little Portland-street Chapel (near Oxford Circus) on the following Sunday mornings: Oct. 8, 15, 22, 29; Nov. 5, 12. Cards entitling the holders to a reserved seat, up to 10.50 A.M., may be obtained on forwarding a stamped and addressed envelope to Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Applications should be made not later than Thursday, Oct. 5.

IN THE INQUIRER of Aug. 5 we referred to a letter on "Worship and Ministry," from the London Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, and to an earlier memorandum on the same subject from the Lancashire and Cheshire quarterly meeting, the substance of which is embodied in the Yearly Meeting letter. This letter emphasises the vital importance of true worship, pointing out that the meeting for worship "is the central feature of our church-life—our chief means alike of uttering our message to the world and of nourishing the life of our own membership."

The following are passages from this most helpful letter:—

"Have we not often forgotten that our spiritual freedom is a heritage for free men—for men of conviction and energy, who will rise to their responsibilities? Unfree spirits will come under the tyrannies of indifference, pre-occupation, routine, and the like, which beset even a Friends' meeting. True worship is intensely active. It consists in offering ourselves to God—body, mind, and soul—for the doing of His will. We have a gift to bring to Him and not only a grace to receive. If we have not individually brought this gift, we need seek no further for one great cause of weakness. An active attitude of soul is of the very essence of a good meeting. May we come into the presence of Christ as disciples—in earnest devotedness and lowly teachableness—and into the presence of one another as brethren—in a living fellowship of love and sympathy. 'One is your Teacher, and all ye are brethren.'

"Gathering in this active spirit of worship and fellowship, we gain vision to see beyond the meeting itself to the ends for which it exists, and find it easy to pass out of the self-sufficing worship, which may be indulged as a spiritual luxury till it enervates the soul into the larger life of sympathy and service wherein we can be used by the Holy Spirit for His work. We realise that we have met with one another and with God, not as a matter of routine, nor for selfish enjoyment, but in order that the power of the Spirit may break forth to the awakening and conversion of souls, the refreshment and inspiration of disciples for the service of God, and the enrichment of their Christian character.

"If the ministry is to be convicting and converting, full of freshness and power, able to inspire with noble ideals, to help the struggling soul into the peace of God, to comfort the weary, to teach the new duties that the new age brings, it must be a word fitly and sincerely spoken, a message flowing from heart to heart, in the freshness of Divine guidance.

"We have before us a great work. The cry for spiritual religion—from village and city, from the unlearned and the educated—was never louder than it is to-day. Does the cry pierce our hearts, as we sit immured in meetings, which too often fall far below our ideal, but which might be replenished by our consecration of service into wells of spiritual life for the world? And, if we hear the call, do we burst the bondage of routine and brace ourselves to the work? Are our loins girt and our lamps burning and we ourselves alert for the voice of our Lord? In Him there is no failure. The failure is in our want of consecration. We owe all that is worth anything in our lives to His love. We hold this gift—the 'sacred burden' of the 'life we bear'—as a stewardship to be used for Him."

Among the many activities of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches has been the endeavour to establish Free Church chaplaincies during the holiday season in various popular resorts on the Continent. This year the special committee charged with the undertaking included Norway in its endeavours, and arranged for services to be conducted during July by the Rev. C. F. Bone, of Snow Hill Congregational Church, Wolverhampton, at Framnaes, near Vossevangen. In the September Free Church Chronicle, Mr. Bone gives an account of his summer chaplaincy. On arrival at Framnaes he found that the large drawing-room of the hotel would be available for the services, and a printed notice was posted in the hall, which arrested the attention, among others, of three English clergymen, who expressed astonishment at this new move of those "daring Dissenters."

On the first Sunday in July a good proportion of the hotel guests attended our service, and during the course of the month both congregations and collections steadily increased. As far as I was able to judge, the gatherings were thoroughly representative in their nature, Anglicans, Methodists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists, and members of the Lutheran Church being seated side by side. The hymns sung were those that by general consent have become the common property of all the Churches, several of the prayers and collects from the English Established Church service were introduced in addition to extemporary prayer, and in the addresses which were given, every attempt was made to avoid all sectarian difference or denominational bias. It is abundantly clear that these services—at least as far as Framnaes is concerned—have met a very definite need, and that they have been most eagerly welcomed as a step in the right direction on the part of English Free Churchmen.

Mr. Bone further suggests that the Council should issue each year in good time before the holiday season begins a printed list of its continental chaplaincies, so that the information may be placed in the hands of travellers going abroad.

YEARS ago, in 1873, we noted in the Spectator the following little gem of verse, by Mr. F. W. Bourdillon, dated from Worcester College, Oxford:—

The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one;
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the dying sun.

The mind has a thousand eyes,
And the heart but one;
Yet the light of a whole life dies
When love is done.

Of this a German rendering was also given:—

Tausend Augen hat die Nacht,
Eins nur giebt dem Tage Licht;
Doch erlischt der Welten Pracht,
Wenn der Sonne Glanz gebricht.

Tausend Augen hat der Geist,
Eins nur hat das Herz dabei;
Doch ein ganzes Leben reizt
Mit der Liebe Tod entzwei.

Since reading those verses, we have always eagerly looked for anything from the same pen, and a fortnight ago the Spectator published the following verses, entitled "Noontide":—

The high stars over at night
Are under at noon;
And a young soul's vision of Heaven
Passes how soon!

He climbs; and the clear seen goal
Is gone—ah! where?
Whispers a voice from the Infinite,
Climb! I am there!

—F. W. BOURDILLON.

POPULAR dialect has seldom found a more genuine and charming poet than Klaus Groth, a native of Holstein, who died at Kiel on June 3, having completed his eightieth year. Born in the province popularly known as Ditmarsh, the son of a miller and small farmer, he began life as a clerk, and then became a school teacher. The language of his every-day life was the Low German (Platt-deutsch) of the district, and this he used with great effect as a poet. His health having broken down through overwork he spent five years of leisure on Fehmarn, an island in the Baltic, and there produced "Quickborn," a little volume of poems, published in 1852, and at once leapt into fame. He led the way, along which Fritz Reuter afterwards followed, and gave the impulse to many other more recent writers in dialect. In 1857 Groth settled as privat docent at the University of Kiel, and in 1866 was appointed professor of German literature. He published other poems and stories in his native dialect and a volume of High German poems.

Min Modersprak, wa klingst du schön!
Wa büst du mi vertrut!
Weer ok min Hart as Stahl un Steen,
Du drevst den Stolt herut.

That is the first verse of "Quickborn," in which the opening poem is a good example of the tenderness and depth of feeling his mother-tongue can express. The book is also rich in humour, laughter and tears and a true love of Nature welling up, as from the heart of the people, in this "living spring" of unassuming and delightful verse.

THE sixth annual report of the Essex Hall Temperance Association, which is issued in pamphlet form, includes a list of the books contained in the two circulating libraries, each housed in a strong box and lent free in the order of application to affiliated societies. The report also gives a list of affiliated societies, a list of books suitable for Band of Hope prizes, and of forty-six loan lantern slides for a lecture on "Some Temperance Pioneers"; also a list of a large number of slides issued by the Band of Hope Union.

MR. F. A. EDWARDS, F.R.G.S., treasurer of the Essex Hall Temperance Association, will represent that organisation at the autumnal conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union at Cardiff next week, and will on Sunday afternoon address the scholars at West-grove Unitarian Church.

WHY should we say that Laund and Wolsey and Hildebrand are historical characters, and forget John Bunyan and Tauler and Thomas à Kempis and St. Francis of Assisi? These men made history too, though it was so exclusively religious history that their work may have often escaped the notice of Church historians. In the history of religion, which do you think the more important, that a certain Hebrew captain was able to smite the Canaanites hip and thigh, or that another Hebrew was able to write "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want"?—Samuel M. Crothers.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. THE MORAL ASPECT OF HEREDITY.

II.—THE NATURE OF VICE.

IN dealing with the subject of Heredity, it is important to clearly distinguish between vice and sin. A man cannot inherit his father's sins, though he may inherit his vices. Sin is the wilful violation of conscience, and whether the result be some trivial self-indulgence or a bolder crime matters little. There can be no distinction between heinous sins and venial sins, for though there are many vices there is only one sin. Sin is the spirit of disobedience; vice is a disease of the mind. It is my endeavour to show that the latter is not synonymous with the former, but simultaneously its consequence and its cure.

Vice has its origin in unrestrained and undisciplined emotions. Wherever an emotion is allowed so to possess the mind as to become a passion, a ruling power governing instead of being governed, the end is always corruption. This is true alike in the indulgence of finer emotions as in the grosser. Religious zeal, unless rightly controlled, breeds fanaticism and cruelty; the musician in his ecstatic frenzy seems but half human; the poet, revelling in his dreams, becomes enervated by his own sensuous fancies. Self-restraint is the secret of moral strength: it is the lack of it which fills our prisons. We find the largest percentage of crime amongst the class least accustomed to any kind of self-control; whose emotions, whether of pleasure or anger, quickly find expression; upon whose appetites there is placed no curb; whose will has become the slave of every momentary impulse. Their worst and only fault is that of self-indulgence; and yet, how terrible are the consequences!—they have become the victims of the awful scourge of vice, appalling to look upon, repulsive in contact.

"Nothing," once remarked a hospital surgeon, "is disgusting or revolting to a doctor." The physician feels no repulsion towards the patient suffering under some noxious disease; where others would retreat in horror, he calmly makes his diagnosis. Nothing can affright or repel him, for he sees beneath the effect to the cause—he understands the nature of disease: it is knowledge which dispels the fears of ignorance. When once we comprehend the nature of vice we shall cease to treat its victims with inhuman cruelty; we shall see they are not quite the loathsome creatures they appear; we shall learn to discriminate between the individual and his disease, and, while putting forth every effort to combat the one, still retain compassion for the other.

Some would say that such a treatment of vice would tend to increase it—that to relax in severity towards the criminal would be to condone his crime; but if we consider the analogous case in the physician's attitude towards disease, we shall see that such fears are groundless. Where disease is least understood its victims are the most neglected and despised: it is the physician who strives hardest to arrest its ravages. His sympathy for the patient does not make him tolerant of the disease, but the more eager to check it; and though his treatment may involve the inflicting of pain, yet it differs from barbaric methods in that he wages war not against the individual but against the disease. How different is the attitude of our moral physicians! What ignorance, what barbarism do they display in the treatment of their patients! Putting aside the humane aspect, was ever anything more unintelligent, more fatuous, than the present Penal system! What should we think of the doctor who had but one formula, one code of treatment for every patient alike—if, for instance, he were to use the knife indiscriminately in fevers or fractures? Yet that is precisely the way the State treats those of her children who are morally diseased. The Penal system is the only approved remedy, and is rigidly applied in every case alike, and this, though it has been proved to be no remedy at all but rather a fruitful means of propagating crime. Plainly, the system was not primarily designed to be remedial, but merely retributive. It was thought that men might be deterred from crime through fear of incurring penalties. In support of this theory it is often alleged that owing to the severity of the penalty attached, garroting has absolutely disappeared from the category of crime. This may be true enough, but does it constitute any real moral gain? Is it possible to instil virtue by means of brutality? To whip a man as you would whip a dog must, of necessity, tend to brutalise him. You may occasionally transform a ruffian into a coward, but is that any advance? You have only exchanged one vice for another, and perhaps a worse.

It may be urged, in justification of retributive methods, that Nature herself has created a precedent in exacting terrible penalties from her law-breakers. Yet even an impartial scientist would admit that Nature's punishments are all remedial. The rod is never allowed to fall in vengeance or unintelligent vindictiveness. Nature, we are told, chooses the lesser evil to prevent the greater. In such a motive, surely, there is the very essence of Beneficence. The pain inflicted by the surgeon's knife leaves behind it no sting; correction, which has for its object the reformation of the offender, will not degrade him. But the staunchest supporter of our Penal system could hardly claim for it that its object is reformation: its motive is rather the protection of the community. Such a policy, if nothing worse, is childishly short-sighted; it is working from without instead of from within: the only way of effectively protecting the community is by reforming the individual. Criminals, we have it upon medical authority, are for the most part "the degenerate offspring of a degenerate stock," that is, they are not so much the originators as the victims of vice. Whilst possessing such information, is it not culpable stupidity to treat them as wholly responsible beings? Strangest of all is the attitude taken upon this question by some of our spiritual teachers, whose mission, one would think, if they have any, is to inculcate such qualities as sympathy, forbearance, and compassion. Yet how often do we find them among the harshest in their judgment of the offender!

Here is an extract from a letter which recently appeared in a leading London paper, written by a Nonconformist minister, on the subject of flogging in jails:—"A more general use of that mode of punishment in cases of violence with robbery would probably produce a healthier tone of thought amongst our criminal gangs. . . . Imprisonment is small punishment to the hardened, and inspires little fear in the hearts of those degraded and inhuman ruffians who are unfit for any other society than their own." Strange words, surely, to fall from the lips of a minister of religion, professedly a follower of Him who came to seek and to save the lost! It is not so much that he should advocate flogging as a remedy for crime—for that he might do conscientiously—but that he should denounce these victims of heredity as "degraded and inhuman ruffians—unfit for any other society than their own." If these are not cases for the spiritual physician, where shall we find them? It is not the righteous but sinners that have to be brought to repentance. This spirit of exclusiveness, "Stand thou there, for I am holier than thou," is the old Pharisaism, a relic of that barbarous cruelty which looked with horror and aversion upon disease; it is the same spirit which persecuted the lepers, herding them together, banishing them from every healthful influence, branding them "unclean"—unfit for any other society than their own.

He who can look upon a soul possessed by evil, and feel nothing but complacency in his own virtues—who can look without pity, without a passionate desire to save, though his creed be of the most orthodox and his character irreproachable, is still at heart a pagan. Personal integrity is but the dry husk of religion, the letter without the spirit; it is but as "sounding brass and clashing cymbals" unless purified and spiritualised by the saving grace of "charity." So long as the vicious are herded together, barred from any other society than their own, what hope can there be of reformation? Punishments, violence, torture—these are not the weapons with which to exorcise evil passions. Vice can only be conquered through contact with virtue; nothing can pierce moral darkness but the light of holiness. And what is personal piety but a sacred trust to be spent in the service of the ignorant and the vicious? Alas! saints stand aloof, looking with horror and indignation upon this plague of vice, wrapping themselves in the garment of their own self-righteousness. We want a Father Damien to feel a great compassion for these moral lepers. We want a spiritual physician who shall care more for human souls than for Theology; whose mission shall consist, not in making converts to some particular creed, or in saving men from some future hell, but in saving them from evil here and now. Strange that while the art of alleviating physical suffering never lacks its devotees, yet the higher art of curing souls remains a comparatively unexplored science! Not until the same intelligence, the same skill, the same selfless devotion which is brought to bear upon physical maladies is extended to moral disease shall we see any practical advancement. When barbaric methods of persecution and isolation are exchanged for a more humane and enlightened system, then, and not till then, will salvation be brought within reach of "our criminal gangs."

LITERATURE.

TWO DANTE BOOKS.*

MR. TOYNBEE earned the gratitude of all Dante students by his singularly excellent Index to the "Oxford Dante"; and unambitious as the task he then performed appeared, it was evident enough that it rested upon a knowledge of Dante and showed an accuracy and acumen which would guarantee the high quality in any more ambitious work its compiler might undertake. These anticipations are not disappointed by the "Dante Dictionary" that lies before us; and Mr. Toynbee's continued vigilance is indicated by the fact that the few omissions which a long use of the Index had revealed to the present writer are, in almost all cases, remedied in the dictionary. If any reader is disappointed, it will be by the limitations of Mr. Toynbee's plan rather than by any faults in its execution. In point of fact it is a dictionary of proper names, for the "notable matters" amount to extremely little except titles of books and groups of persons. Mr. Toynbee's method is to give under each heading, first, such general information as he may think to the purpose, concerning the person or place in question, then a very full and careful account of the part played, or the appearances made by the same in any or all of Dante's works, and then illustrative quotations from the old commentators or other early authorities. Dubious texts or interpretations are also discussed.

The cataloguing and analysing of the passages in Dante's works, in some cases amounts to an instructive treatise on the poet's conception of the subject in hand. The convenience of the form in which the matter is arranged, and the extraordinary care which Mr. Toynbee has taken to keep himself abreast of the latest specialist investigations, together with the great variety of tables (38 in all), will make every student of Dante who possesses the book constantly refer to it in preference to other works. And in a few years' time, therefore, the accuracy of its details and the correctness of its references will have been subjected to severe and continuous test. The first impression is very favourable and augurs well for the final verdict; but Mr. Toynbee appears to be more interested in history and geography than in theology, and is, as a rule, more instructive than enlightening.

Inaccuracies, where such a mass of facts are gathered together, are inevitable; though, as is usually the case, the particular inaccuracies detected seem strangely gratuitous. Why, for instance, should Evander be called a Trojan, when the whole beauty of the episode in which he appears in the Æneid is dependent on his being a Greek colonist in Italy, and, nevertheless, an ally of Æneas? (p. 414.) And why should the noble story told by contemporary biographers of Dominic, that when a student he sold his books to feed the poor, be toned down into the commonplace statement that he sold his clothes for that purpose? (p. 205.) Some more serious errors we have noted, but they are evidently mere slips of the pen, or belong to that strange but familiar category of slips of the mind which come under the same general laws as slips of the pen! In spite of these evidences of what Dante calls the "alloy of humanity," the dictionary is a monument of learning and industry, and at the same time is one of the most practically useful books of reference on Dante ever published.

Dr. Moore's second volume of "Studies in Dante," as a whole, will scarcely maintain the reputation of its predecessor; but it contains one essay of the very highest value. There is a little treatise, which appears in all the collected editions of Dante's works, on the levels of Earth and Water. It was first published in 1508 by a certain Padre Moncetti, who gave no information as to how he came by it. It is never mentioned by any early authority, and no MS. of it is known to exist. Under these suspicious circumstances it is little wonder that modern scholars have grown accustomed contemptuously to dismiss its claims to authenticity. The discussion, however, has been conducted in an entirely unsatisfactory manner. Little knowledge of science, and no knowledge of the history of science, has been shown in the debate, and the shallowest reasons for declaring that the work cannot be authentic have been allowed to pass current. Dr. Moore has taken up the question afresh, and unless further investigations should modify his conclusions he may be regarded as having established it as certain that the work must have been written not very far from Dante's time, and probably was written by the poet himself. The idea that it is a shameless forgery of Moncetti's own, and that it betrays a knowledge of fifteenth-century science, absolutely collapses under Dr. Moore's investigations. Moreover, he has gathered a considerable body of information to show that in scientific circles in Dante's time this subject of the levels of Earth and Water was a burning question. This part of his case Dr. Moore might strengthen. There is a celebrated MS. in the Medicean library in Florence which constitutes our only authority for certain letters attributed to Dante. It formerly belonged to Boccaccio, and the greater part of it, including all that is directly connected with Dante, is written in his own hand; but when he began on the volume it already contained a little treatise entitled "The Tractate of the Sphere of Matter, composed by the magnificent, nay, divine, Andalò de Nigro of Genoa," which treatise contains, together with other matter, a discussion of this very question of the relative levels of Earth and Water, with quaint diagrammatic illustrations. A comparison of the treatment in this Tractate with that in the Dantesque "Aqua et Terra" shows that the two writers had the same general stock of ideas and presuppositions, and were interested in the same questions. But in method and scientific grasp the Dantesque treatise towers as high above that of Andalò as the Divine Comedy does above Brunetto Latini's "Treasure." The treatise, if genuine, was written very shortly before the author's death, and the mind rests with a wonderful sense of satisfaction on the conception of the great seer, while elaborating the sublimest portions of his poem, not only finding time and energy to conduct diplomatic missions for his friend and protector Guido, and to indulge in the gracious intercourse with his friends which finds its monument in his Eclogues, but also, "nursed from his boyhood in the love of truth," seeking to establish the elementary truths concerning gravitation and the laws by which water finds its level, as well as to reveal the truths that free the human soul from earthly impediments, and enable it to obey the law of spiritual gravitation by which it mounts to God.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

SHORT NOTICES.

Local Government, by W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., Recorder of Winchester, is practically a new volume in the "English Citizen" series. The subject was originally treated in this series by Mr. M. D. Chalmers in 1883, but legislation since that date has been so effectual as to render a fresh treatment essential. Dr. Odgers's book contains the substance of six lectures delivered last year in Middle Temple Hall, and it gives a lucid and extremely interesting sketch of the system of Local Government in this country, with just so much history of the various institutions as to make the present condition of things intelligible. When Mr. Chalmers dealt with the subject in 1883, he declared that "Local Government in this country may be fitly described as consisting of a chaos of areas, a chaos of authorities, and a chaos of rates." Dr. Odgers shows how much we owe to the Local Government Acts of 1888 and 1894 for the better ordering of our affairs, especially by the consolidation of authorities and the simplification of areas. After a preliminary sketch, successive chapters deal with the parish, the borough, the union, the county district, the school authority, the highway authority, the burial authority, and the county. London, the great anomaly, is dealt with separately, and a concluding chapter deals with the central authority of the Local Government Board. Dr. Odgers utters a timely warning in regard to the very serious increase of local expenditure and the growth of municipal debts, and in one particular, pointing out that of the 836,913 persons in receipt of poor relief on January 1, 1898, 107,071 were adult able-bodied paupers, urges that "by means of emigration, home colonies, or in some other way, the pauperism that calls for such enormous expenditure must be diminished." This admirable handbook will be of great service to those who desire to realise the opportunities and responsibilities of their citizenship. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d.)

Life and Letters of Erasmus, by James Anthony Froude, consists of twenty lectures delivered at Oxford, 1893-4, and published in the autumn of the latter year; a cheaper edition was immediately called for, and it has been repeatedly re-issued, testifying to the popularity of the lectures. The book is now included in the "Silver Library," taking its place beside the edition of Köstlin's "Life of Luther," but with no such illustrations as added to the interest of that work. The illustrations of Mr. Froude's vivid lectures are to be found in the large number of Erasmus's letters, which are quoted. The friend of Colet and Sir Thomas More, the editor of the first edition of the Greek New Testament, with an independent translation, the contemporary and critic of Luther's great movement of Reformation, Erasmus appears as one of the most striking figures in a great epoch of history. "The best description of the state of Europe," says Mr. Froude, "in the age immediately preceding the Reformation will be found in the correspondence of Erasmus." (Longmans, Green and Co. 3s. 6d.)

Hymns, by Minot Judson Savage, is a little book containing seventy pieces written in the course of an active ministry, and many of them for special occasions. The hymns do not carry us away as some in Hosmer and Gannett's "Thought of God," but Mr. Savage's clear thought and earnest spirit are apparent in all that he writes, and some of these hymns have already found their way to a wide acceptance. They give an opportunity to sing of the progress of thought and the gladness of a liberal faith. Where they seem to move most easily and to kindle to the warmest glow is in such hymns as "O star of Truth, down shining"—perhaps the best known of all, and characteristic of the fearless heretic, who left the church of his fathers for conscience sake. Another good example is in the verses:—

Where once were walled divisions,
Built up of form and creed,
Lo! now spring fragrant flowers
Of loving thought and deed;
While through all hearts is running
The grand electric thrill
Of faith that man's salvation
Is doing God's good will.

With trust in God's free spirit,—
The ever-broadening ray
Of truth that shines to guide us
Along our forward way,
Let us to-day be faithful
As were the brave of old,
Till we, their work completing,
Bring in the age of gold!

UNWHOLESOME HYMNS.

WRITING in the Guardian on the subject of hymns, a "Brutal Layman" pleads for more good congregational tunes in the services of the church, and then proceeds with the following suggestive criticism of what is found in "Hymns, Ancient and Modern":—

"And then the words—a far more serious matter. In this garden of devotional song how often are we pulled up short by some glaring incongruity, disfiguring the page like a fungus growth among the flowers. Now it is some doggerel, whose claim to preservation it is difficult to conceive or imagine; now some thought strangely at variance with our Christian professions; now the survival, or perhaps imitation, of some extravagant refinement of an old-world asceticism. Is it possible, we ask ourselves, that a collection which includes such things as these has had the supervision of the cultured minds and brains we know to be at work in the upper ranks of our English hierarchy; that they have deliberately sanctioned and set down for our use such words as some of our hymns contain—at times so childish, at times so jarring on all sense of the fitness of things? For it is strange what horrors familiarity will lead us to make light of, what straining of language we may come by mere repetition to accept as natural, losing sight, it would seem, of the simple meaning of words, hardly knowing what we say. We do not mean it, I suppose, when we lightly sing, for example—

Oh! may we thus ensure
Our lot among the blest,
And watch a moment to secure
An everlasting rest.

Otherwise what an astonishing view is here! What a contradiction to the very essence of our faith—as though self-preservation, forsooth, were the highest aim of man, and the Christian life no more than a cautious and well-calculated investment! This is a notion, however, to be found in other places where it would be least expected. Even the favourite motto, 'No cross no crown,' hardly seems to embody quite the loftiest ideal. But if simple words such as these may be explained away there are lower depths of incongruity from which there is not the same escape.

"It has become a byword, I know, that we have grown so squeamish nowadays that we cannot bear even the thought of pain. A false charge I hold it to be, but, at all events, it is more than squeamishness which revolts from the morbid word-painting, from the forced, unnatural dwelling on all that is most terrible in physical suffering, which characterises so many of our hymns, as though there were in it some virtue of special devotion. Hymns on the Passion must doubtless find a place in every such manual, but surely here, if anywhere, we might be spared the crying vice of modern literature and modern taste, which drags into publicity all that is most sacred in thought and feeling, which posts on every hoarding, as it were, and publishes to the man in the street the buried love-letters, the broken words of the dying, the secrets of heart-rending partings, the sickening details of actual torture. To some of us it may seem that the sanctity of the most awful of all tragedies is not enhanced by giving such exclusive prominence to the contemplation of that climax of physical agony.

But, granting that we have no right, if we would, to shut our eyes to this most human aspect of the story, are we so satisfied with the best of our language that it seems to us a fitting vehicle for such thoughts as we find set down in our hymn-books? Is nothing to be reserved for the inner sanctuary, to be dwelt upon only 'in secret' and 'when thou hast shut thy door'? Are there no words left unspeakable? Is no thought too sacred to be set to music and sung in chorus?"

OBITUARY.

THE REV. ELI FAY.

THE recently-announced death of the Rev. Eli Fay will touch memories in a very wide circle both in England and America, for it has been given to few ministers to fill so varied and so widespread relations.

My own memory of him carries me back some thirty-five years or so, when I first heard of him in connection with Antioch College—an institution for the higher education of young men and women, under the direction of a denomination known as Christians—in which many of our Unitarian friends were deeply interested. I think he was President of this College for some time.

He came more immediately within my knowledge when he took charge, as he must have done about that date, of the old and influential first church of Taunton, Mass. Here he immediately made his mark as a powerful and popular preacher, and as a vigorous personality—an impression which was repeated here in England, when, ten years or so later, he came here, seeking change of scene. He settled in Sheffield, where I am sure his energy, clearness, and decisiveness, both as a preacher and a character, will be gratefully remembered. His ministry at the Upper Chapel lasted from 1876 until 1888. Reasons of health, and, perhaps, also, of temperament, took him again to America, and now he went as far west as Kansas City, trying to find material for a congregation in that neighbourhood. When one starts to "go West" in the States, however, there is really no logical conclusion short of the Pacific coast. Mr. Fay certainly felt the drawing westward, and followed it, till he came to Los Angeles in Southern California. Here it was that the best and most effective work of his life was done, and to him and his efforts is largely due the comparative success of our churches in that district. He began preaching in the opera-house of Los Angeles, and soon drew together a congregation, who built a spacious and beautiful church, which was filled to overflowing.

Failure of health and increasing years obliged him after a time to relinquish his work here; but he did not give up his enthusiastic devotion to the cause in which he had spent his life. He continued still to preach to various smaller congregations who were pastorless; and I have received from at least one such the warmest tributes to his fervour and eloquence.

It is only lately that I read in the Christian Register some of the wisest and justest words on the office of the ministry and the needed qualifications for it which have ever fallen in my way—the words of a man who knew, from long experience, what he was speaking of—the ripened fruit of a life of large and effective labours.

He had in his life one unique experience—unique, I mean, for a minister. A fortunate investment suddenly placed him among millionaires—or, at least, made him very rich. I have sometimes in idle moments, or when feeling the pressure of the other extreme, speculated on what I would do if I were suddenly the possessor of a million. Perhaps some of my brother ministers have done the same. When Mr. Fay had this unusual experience, what he proposed to do was to found and endow a college for women. This disinterested purpose was not carried out, for fortune withdrew her smiles, but that it was formed, speaks for the large generosity of Mr. Fay's nature.

But that part of his work which depended not on fortune, but on himself, will remain so long as there remain lives whom he has influenced and characters he has helped to mould. S. F.

MRS. COLFOX, OF BRIDPORT.

WE have to record with deep regret the death of Mrs. Colfox, of Rax, Bridport, which took place on Friday evening, Sept. 8, and brings a loss to the town and to our congregation there which will be most severely felt. She was the daughter of Henry Wansey, of Warminster, where was her early home. After her marriage with the late Thomas Colfox, she came to reside entirely in Bridport, and identified herself closely with the best interests of the place. She was one of the founders of the School of Art, at a time when there was little good art teaching in the provincial districts of England, and every other art school in the county owes its origin to the movement begun here. She helped to manage the Industrial School, which was in some sense the precursor of the Cottage Hospital, and took an important part in the change which resulted in the establishment of this hospital and dispensary. She was among the founders of the company which started the Coffee Tavern, and liberally assisted the Rev. R. L. Carpenter in the establishment of the Public Baths. The Drinking Fountain at the back of the Market House was her design and gift. She took deep interest in the General Schools, and showed it both as a subscriber and a visitor. The starting of Ambulance classes in the town was due to her initiative, and for some years she was their hon. secretary. Her private charity was as thoughtful and considerate as it was generous, for she was one who always gave herself along with her gifts, and the lameness which of late years hindered her personal visits to the homes of her many friends among the poor, was the cause of a deprivation which she keenly felt.

All this shows how wide were her sympathies, how unsectarian was the spirit in which she sought the good of those among whom she lived. In theology she was a Unitarian, most regular in her attendance at the Sunday service, as well as at the Communion service on the evening before Good Friday. She had the deepest sympathy for the Sunday school, and about nine years ago planned considerable extension to the school room and defrayed its whole cost, thus furnishing the teachers with ample and much needed accommodation. On Sunday afternoons she had a class coming to her own house; and this, in spite of declining strength, she retained to the end. To the British and Foreign Unitarian Association she was a most liberal subscriber, as well as to every other cause which had a similar claim on her support. For several years she undertook the correspondence of one of the branches of the Unitarian Postal Mission. In politics she was all her life a consistent Liberal, though her interest in such matters latterly was much less than it had been in earlier days. Her state of health had caused anxiety for some time and had brought suffering which she endured with much fortitude, but her actual illness lasted less than three weeks, and was for the most part a painless sinking into unconsciousness.

The funeral took place on Monday, Sept. 11. The service was held in the Unitarian Chapel, and was attended not only by relatives and members of the congregation, with Sunday-school teachers and elder scholars, but also by many of the leading inhabitants of the town. In the course of the service, the Rev. H. S. Solly gave the following address:—"One thought is foremost in our minds to-day. We have lost a friend. It is a thought in many minds, for we have lost from sight one whose sympathy was very wide and felt in very many homes. We remember her love for this House of God, the zeal and devotion with which she continued to come and worship with us here in spite of infirmities which would have daunted a less determined spirit. We remember the interest she took in the religious training of generation after generation of children in our Sunday-school; how she spent and was spent in the service of this great cause. We remember her work for the good of this town, the institutions established and maintained by her aid for the good of those among whom she lived. We remember the generosity which extended far beyond the limit of those whom she had ever met face to face, and was ready to respond to every appeal which could put forth any claim deserving her support. We remember the Christian charity often known only to the Father who seeth in secret, always so wise and loving, thoughtful and considerate. We remember the example of her own home, centre of that pure and tender influence which makes the ties of family so lasting and so strong for good.

"We have lost a leader, one who had clear vision to discern the right, and moral resolution to do promptly that which it is right to do; one who could walk by faith, never doubting that where God gave a duty He also would give the means to do it, and would bless the doing of the task. So would she lead the way with ripe judgment and the wisdom of a loving heart, and we were glad to follow in her steps.

"But all her life was that of a humble follower of Jesus Christ. She was a true Christian disciple, seeking no other Master, seeking to be led by Jesus to his Father and our Father—his God and our God; thinking for herself what is true, and deciding with a judgment independent of mere human authority, but loving the old ways of her forefathers, and never desirous of wandering out of that line of spiritual descent which takes back the Christian Church to the Prophet of Nazareth.

"Such was the spirit of the life whose loss we mourn. We would thank God for what He gave us."

A SERMON TO YOUNG PEOPLE.*

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."—Zechariah, iv. 6.

I HAVE recently spent two or three weeks in Switzerland, that land of majestic heights and deep valleys, of snow-clad summits and rich meadows, of wide glaciers, apparently as still and cold as death, of joyously rushing streams and lovely waterfalls. The natural scenery of that fair land is full of striking contrasts. Down in the smiling valleys through which runs the torrent all milky white from the glacier bed, you see the sloping hayfields, which in the early summer, before the mower's scythe is active, are masses of brilliant variegated colour from their myriad flowers; or the vines, planted in endless rows, with their fresh foliage of vivid green; the garden-patches of the peasants, undefended by hedge or wall; the cattle-sheds, roughly constructed of huge brown logs; the houses of the people themselves who are busy in their gardens, or at their wood-carving or lace-making; and the only sounds you hear are the tinkling of the goat-bells, the humming of the bees, and the murmur of the rills of water rushing through the narrow channels which have been cut in the turf for the sake of irrigation. And then you pass upwards on the mountain side to the green slopes far above, where the kine graze in the summer-time, but whence they are driven in the winter; from below, against the dark background the cattle look like tiny points of white or brown. Up there you find the gentians and the wild chrysanthemums, and higher still the edelweiss, and other lovely flowers which grow beyond the beaten track. You go still higher through the belt of dark pines or feathery larches, from whose cool shade you look out upon the corresponding slopes on the other side of the valley; around you are thickets made brilliant by the ruddy tints of the alpine rose. But still you have the real mountain to climb when the pine-belt ends, and you pass upwards over a vast tract where the grass becomes poorer and scantier, where the slaty rock juts out of the ground, and where you come upon many a patch of last winter's snow, not yet melted by the rays of a July sun. Still higher, until all vegetation disappears, and you stand upon some rocky plateau, with a white waste all around; above you is the eternal snow, at your side a sheer precipice, at your feet the glacier, an immense and silent sea of sloping solid ice, the extremity of which is hidden from view by the curve of the valley; and yet it is a thing of beauty, for as you stand upon it and look down into its deep crevasses you see that these cold and gloomy depths are tinted with the most exquisite of purple hues. Around the lofty snow-crowned summits the clouds are ever resting; from their precipitous sides now and then a distant rumble proclaims the descending avalanche, a huge cataract of snow pouring down from ledge to ledge and hurling down rocks and boulders in its passage; and sometimes when a thunderstorm gathers, those bleak and frozen wastes are lit up with the lightning flash, whilst the roll of thunder resounds from peak to peak. What a contrast! You go upwards from the peaceful, smiling scene of human industry among the flower-strewn meadows by the stream, where Nature is all loveliness and quiet beauty to the vast desolations of snow and ice, and to the amazing evidences of the mighty forces which move the avalanche, hurl down the rocks, press forward the glacier in its broad deep channel, and make the fields of eternal snow resound to the crash of the storm.

Now let me ask, which makes the strongest appeal to the sensibility of the visitor, the charm of the valley or the sublime desolation of the mountain-top? I think you will suppose with me that in the recollection the thought lingers most pleasantly over the beauty of the valley. The Creator seems to speak to the soul of man more effectually by that which typifies His smile, His sympathy, His love, than by that which shows forth His power and might. It may now and then be good for us to be made to tremble before the evidences of His majesty, to have before our eyes some visible symbol of His greatness, and to be compelled to acknowledge that we are but as the small dust of the balance; but more often our hearts will make a readier response to that which appeals to them on the side of tenderness and beauty, and which seems directly to reflect the love of God. "Not by might, nor by power, but by My spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

A passenger takes an ocean voyage and has various experiences, both in fine and rough weather; and when the voyage is over and he reviews the record of each day, will he not find that the deepest and most lasting impression on his mind is not of the furious battle between wind and sea, not of the gale whistling through the sheets, or the shriek and jar of the screw when for a moment it was lifted out of the trough of the ocean, not the feeling of utter helplessness in the hands of One who wielded all the tremendous forces of Nature,—but the memory will love to linger rather over the golden glories of sunset and sunrise reflected on a calm unbroken surface, the phosphorescence of the waves at prow or stern, the crescent moon, and all the host of heaven mirrored in the liquid depths?

If that is so with us now, so was it in ages past. The prophet Elijah fled away from Jezebel, the heathen queen who had vowed to take his life, and retiring into the wilderness he prayed God to let him die, for he believed that the whole purpose of his existence was brought to nought, and all his hopes were at an end. In his extreme dejection of spirit he sought the desolate crags of Horeb, and there, so we read, "the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire." We do not know precisely what was the experience of the prophet which is thus described, whether or not it was a real storm or earthquake, or some sudden and appalling display of the powers of Nature; but whatever that experience was, it did not touch Elijah's heart, did not lift him out of his depression, nor imbue him with fresh courage; but by and by when his passion was calmed, and the still, small voice spake in his soul, he could believe that all was not yet over, that there was still meaning in his life, and more work for him to do; fresh hope was kindled on the cold ashes of his heart. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

All through Nature a mighty power is moving. At every moment it is manifested in the passing cloud, the stirring breeze, the ebb and flow of the tides, the passage of the sap in the veins of the leaf, and in the continuous vibrations of particles in all material things. It is probable that we have never recognised these movements as flowing from the personal will of the Creator; we have regarded them as the unconscious product of a huge piece of natural mechanism of which He may be the first remote cause, but not necessarily the continual sustainer and upholder. The exhibition of inexhaustible force working ever through space has not aroused our purest affections nor commanded all that was best and noblest in our hearts; nay, it has even repelled us sometimes, so unheeding, so un pitying has it seemed to be. But we have another experience altogether in our moments of supreme joy or of deepest sorrow, in our time of spiritual exaltation, of glad thankfulness for unexpected blessings, or of sore contrition for the evil we have done; for then we are brought into communion with the Eternal Spirit, we are within the reach of a divine constraining influence, our conscience is quickened, and God seems to be quite near. It is not the aspect of power which soothes and sanctifies our whole being, it is the touch of the spirit of the Lord of Hosts.

And so through all history we find that the Almighty has been leading forward men and nations by His spirit rather than His might. By an exercise of His will He might have made all men perfect at the beginning, so that they should never be able to do anything contrary to the highest ideal of goodness and holiness; but then men and women would have been little better than machines. He preferred that they should be moral beings, capable of choosing for themselves, able to do right, able also to do wrong, but with hearts lying open to divine influences, so that he might slowly educate them and lead them onward to the higher life. So with all who have benefited their city, state, or race by some great deed of heroism or self-sacrifice, God does not force them to take this decisive step. He does not compel them to go in one direction only, but He opens before their eyes the bright vision of some worthy aim, reveals to them a glorious possibility for which it were well even to place in jeopardy ease and health and life itself; and so He gently leads them on in the footsteps of His saints and martyrs. So in the case of that great leader, to whom our text refers, Five hundred years before Christ, Zerubbabel was chief of the exiled tribe of Judah in the country of the Persian King Cyrus. The Jews were a race of slaves in the service of a heathen king, and so by the rivers of Babylon, conquered by Cyrus, as we read in the 137th Psalm, they sat down and wept when they remembered Zion; they hung their harps on the willows, for they had no heart to sing the songs of Zion. By His mighty hand and stretched-out arm, by sudden rebellion, war and bloodshed, Jehovah might have restored His people to their own land; but He did not. It was better that the chosen race, purified by much suffering and disaster, should find its way by slow degrees out of darkness into light, and so He put it into the heart of Cyrus to permit the Jews to return to their own land, and moved the soul of Zerubbabel with a worthy ambition to be the leader of his race, bring back the remnant of the people to the ruins of the Holy City, and rebuild the temple on the spot which had been consecrated by a thousand tender memories. That great revolution actually took place not with the shock of battle, but all gently and silently, as God touched and moved the hearts of His people. So in the case of those who suffer want. By His divine will God might change all the conditions of human existence, so that hunger, thirst, starvation and misery should be known no more. But He deems it wiser to work through the slower instrumentality of human pity and human love, and puts it into the hearts of philanthropists and sisters of mercy to do their blessed work. Not by His power so much as by His spirit He leads men onward to Himself.

If that be God's usual plan of action, should it not be yours also? You who are still young cannot be said to exert any influence in the world by way of your physical strength which is not yet matured, or of your intellectual endowments which are not yet developed; but already you may touch those who are about you by the sweetness of your disposition, the sincerity of your trustfulness, the alacrity of your obedience. As you grow older the spirit with which you perform every task will infect others; your cheerfulness, courage and patience will overflow into the hearts of others. In one of Charles Dickens' stories poor little Paul Dombey grew weaker and weaker until he had to lie on his couch all day, but he was not peevish or selfish; as his strength waned his disposition became sweeter and more unselfish every day, and so truly did his spirit touch all who saw him, that rough uncultured men felt themselves uplifted into a holier atmosphere when they looked upon his wan pale face. And the strength and beauty of a pure young life is seen in David, the shepherd lad, who, being employed to take some provisions to his brothers who were serving in the army of Saul, himself dared to confront Goliath, the tall champion of the Philistines, and by his amazing courage brought back the spirit of bravery into the hearts of all Israel. It was not by his might so much as by his dexterity, and more than all by his undaunted spirit, that he became victor. How many there have been who, though weak in body, have done great things for God and man. Paul's bodily presence was weak, but his letters were weighty and powerful, and the world will never lose the influence of his great character. "The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; if we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit."

INSPIRED SCRIPTURE AND SONG.

In the services of the Church of England the Book of Psalms, as is well known, is appointed to be read through (or sung) in a stated order once every month. No omissions or deviations from that order are allowed, except that on certain high festivals, instead of the Psalms falling on those days, other special Psalms are appointed. Referring to this practice, in some articles on "Reform of the Anglican System of Psalms and Canticles," contributed to the Church Gazette at the beginning of the present year, Canon CHEYNE said that it appeared to him open to very severe criticism.

It reminds us of the old Puritan practice which was carried by the Pilgrim Fathers to New England, of reading the English Bible straight through over and over again, from beginning to end. That practice was not nearly as much conducive to edification as the opposite practice of selecting the most suitable portions. For some books of the Bible contain but little that is edifying, and, similarly, there are certain Psalms, which only those students who can see the Divine Spirit working upon most unpromising material, can find spiritually helpful. And even in those Psalms which, upon the whole, are elevating and inspiring, there are verses which, to the Christian sentiment, are displeasing or even offensive.

This objection Canon CHEYNE further emphasises by saying that it is well that the Psalms are now generally sung, since this enables people to glide gently over the parts they do not understand and do not sympathise with, and they are not obliged to say the imprecatory passages; and yet, he adds, "I am afraid that this hardly justifies putting the imprecatory Psalms into the mouths of tender choristers."

For the sake of the healthy influence of foreign missions he also pleads: "Let us ask how we can put before our converts a Prayer-book which contains so many imprecatory Psalms? Will it not seem to those of them who think at all as if we were just as vindictive, and as if our God were just as vindictive, as heathen warriors? . . . I fear that our unmitigated adoption of the Psalter as it stands may counteract that spirit of love which is one half of Christianity."

Let the laity study these matters, and express an opinion upon them, and the reform will come all the quicker. The laity have often criticised the clergy for using old formulæ in a new sense, for putting new wine into old bottles. But the laity do this themselves every day when they come to church and say or sing the Psalms straight through with the choir or the minister. The Hebrew Psalms, even if post-exilic, need to be adapted for use in the Christian Church; it is not right to continue a usage which is detrimental to the highest interests of religion—detrimental also to a proper regard for the rights of language. As a matter of fact, we need a fresh translation of the Psalms.

But it is not merely a new translation of the Psalms that is wanted. The more radical reform for which Canon CHEYNE pleads is the power of selection and the omission of objectionable passages, a practice with which we have happily long been familiar in our Free Churches, in various selections, and particularly in the admirable edition of the Psalter by the late ROBERT CROMPTON JONES.

As to the canticles in the Prayer-book, Canon CHEYNE asks that there should be greater variety, and that, at any rate, a few more optional canticles, taken from the Scriptures, might be allowed. Above all he singles out that New Testament psalm, though not written as a psalm, "yet full of a lyric enthusiasm," 1 Corinthians xiii., as admirably suited to be introduced at once as a Christmas canticle in place of Psalms xlv. and cx., or as an optional sacramental canticle, since love is the very secret of Christianity.

And then, in conclusion, Canon CHEYNE adds these most significant words:—

"Of 'uninspired' canticles I cannot speak in a few lines. They exist, if we open our eyes to them, and, if technically uninspired, they burn, nevertheless, with a fire of no earthly origin, and it would be a proof of a special spiritual gift to recognise and to use them."

In a previous article, urging the reform which he held to be within more immediate reach, Canon CHEYNE had already said in a parenthesis, "we can hardly ask, as yet, for 'uninspired' modern canticles"; and these sentences clearly prove the writer's conviction that, in spite of the technical distinction between inspired and uninspired scriptures, there are canticles and other lyric utterances (parallel, for instance, with the great chapter in Corinthians) worthy to be used side by side with the Psalter of the Bible in religious service. That such an avowal should be publicly made by a Canon of the Church of England and an Oxford Professor of the Interpretation of Scripture, we take to be a hopeful sign of the times, to be set against other significant movements in a very opposite direction; but we quote it here not simply for the sake of its interest in connection with the progress of thought in the Church of England, we desire to emphasise and to carry the thought a little further, especially in the light of the final words: "It would be a proof of a special spiritual gift to recognise and to use them."

What Canon CHEYNE says of the Bible, and the Psalter in particular, must apply, as it appears to us, not only to the psalms and canticles sung in the services of devotion, but with equal force to the lessons read. There are many passages of the Bible quite unfit, and many more at best very ill-adapted to be read as lessons in a religious service; while, on the other hand, it would seem a strange denial of the fundamental truths of spiritual religion to say that centuries of Christian devotion, nurtured on the Bible, have produced nothing that is worthy to rank as scripture to be read as lessons in church.

Taking the Gospels and Epistles as the central and most precious records of that religious life which is our great inheritance and our sacred trust in the present, we have on the one hand the literature of the early centuries, of various degrees of worth, but rich in inspiration, and of especial value as showing to us the growth of religious knowledge in a progressive spiritual life; then, on the other hand, we have the literature of the succeeding Christian centuries; and surely from this we may gather treasures of devotion, of reverent exposition of divine law, of glowing prophetic utterance as truly inspired and speaking to us the living word of God, as those more ancient records in the Old Testament. If that is the case, ought we not to bear witness to our faith in the continuing Divine Presence in our life, the continuing inspiration and guidance succeeding generations have received, by giving a recognised place in our religious services to the best of that more recent sacred literature? We are not, of course, proposing the formation of any new canon of scripture; we only plead for a larger liberty in the choice of lessons. Nothing is further from our thought than to suggest that less attention should be given to the Bible or less reverence paid to its priceless treasures. We believe that the Bible would be more truly appreciated and with a more discerning and grateful reverence, if the worth of other sacred literature, which we have inherited, were also more fully appreciated and used for the nurture of our present religious life.

This subject we have long had in mind, and during the present year in our column of "The Inward Life," we have from time to time printed passages which have seemed to us not only helpful for private devotion, but fitted also to be read as lessons in devotional services. Many sections of the "Imitatio Christi" have seemed to us as good to be so read as any chapter, for instance, in the Book of Proverbs, and we have also gratefully used selections from the "Psalms and Litanies" of ROWLAND WILLIAMS and "Psalms of the West." We should be glad to hear from those of our readers who are interested in this question, and with the help of their wider experience continue to add to our collection of such helpful latter-day scriptures.

THOUGHTS FROM ITALY.

VI.—PERUGIA.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.,
MINISTER OF ALL SOULS' CHURCH, BELFAST.

"A city set upon a hill."—Matt. v. 14.

SEVERAL times I have spoken of Umbria. It is a pleasant hill-country about halfway between Florence and Rome, apart from the great centres of trade and politics, and known, on account of its provinciality and sacred associations, as the "Galilee of Italy." Assisi is its Nazareth, a township of which probably nobody heard until St. Francis made it famous. Around it are other small towns, each on its hill-top or buried in its secluded valley, independent, tenacious of its local traditions, and little altered by the centuries.

Chief of these towns is Perugia, a most wonderful old city perched on a rocky summit 1,700 feet above the level of the sea. The railway runs at the foot of the hill; but when the traveller has climbed the steep ascent from the station, and entered, first, the outer circuit of walls, which are mediæval, and then the inner circuit, which are huge masses of Etruscan masonry restored by Cæsar Augustus in the days of Christ, he forgets modern civilisation. He finds himself in the midst of an almost continuous pile of stonework, burrowed by passages rather than divided by streets, and he makes his way through narrow alleys and underground lanes, up and down long flights of steps, catching here and there a glimpse of the sky above the tall roofs or of the valley stretching far below the precipitous sides of the city.

In an open space in the centre are the cathedral and the public-hall, and, between these, a grand old fountain, perhaps the finest piece of work of the kind in the world, covered with mediæval sculpture illustrating the seasons and their industries. Water was scarce in such a situation, and when a supply was brought down from a higher spur of the Apennines, the Perugians built for it this splendid monument, designed by Giovanni Pisano, a famous architect and sculptor of Pisa, a contemporary of Arnolfo and Cimabue. It is a notable instance of the union of the useful and the beautiful, and an illustration of what the public can do for itself. The peasants who halt here to give their mules drink, and the women and children bringing their pitchers for water, may feel that the fountain belongs to them and was put up for them, and they may see, even if they cannot read, the simple doings of their lives pictured and honoured on its stones. This should teach us to build nobly. It should teach us in this great and growing city to erect monuments in which we can all take pleasure, in which the linen-weavers and shipwrights, among others, may see their labour in estimation.*

But with even more pleasure than of the Etruscan walls and Pisano's fountain, I think of the view from Perugia of Mount Subasio and Assisi. I shall not forget the beautiful summer evening of our arrival. On every hand in the clear air was the delicate peaceful landscape of the Umbrian painters. I recognised in a moment the pretty blue distances, and the calm skies of Perugino and Raphael. And, as I have said, looking south-east, we saw Assisi, ten or twelve miles away, its white stone glittering in the setting sun, and its famous church, built by Jacopo over St. Francis' grave, and adorned on the inside by Cimabue and Giotto, plainly visible in the left hand corner. I am sure I watched it for an hour, thinking of St. Francis and Dante, and of the Italy of their influence, of its great achievements and its striking lessons for our modern world.

Nor shall I forget the next morning. I was awakened about five o'clock by the screaming of the swifts in the blue sky and the tinkling bells of the carts slowly mounting the steep hill. Through the circular window of my room I saw with astonishment that the scenery of the previous evening had all vanished, and in its place was a vast sea of rolling sparkling mist, dotted with peaks which rose up, crowned with ancient buildings, like towered islands, and then disappeared and appeared again as in a fairy world; while occasionally the bright cloud would break and disclose the regularly tilled fields far away in the valley beneath.

A little later I had made my way across the city to a quiet spot on the outer walls. Except for some women washing clothes in a conduit hard by, and a schoolboy on his way to a surprisingly early lesson, and a couple of workmen measuring a piece of timber, I had the neighbourhood to myself, and I sat down in an old grass-covered square in front of a small church. A friend gave me a series of photographs of this church some years ago, so that I was more or less familiar with it; but I was totally unprepared for its extraordinary wealth of colour. The marble façade, covered nearly every square foot of it with sculpture, glowed a pale rose in the morning sun and was set off by the blue of the sky as well as by a blue colouring on certain parts of its surface.

The sculpture represents St. Bernardino in glory, surrounded by angels and cherubs, and the chief incidents of his life; and it is signed by the artist as the work of Agostino of Florence, with the date 1461. Who was St. Bernardino? I do not know much about him beyond that he was the son of a noble family in the neighbourhood of Siena who became a Franciscan and endeavoured to revive the original strict vows of the order. It was in vain. He could not do more than temporarily check the tendency to gather wealth, which ultimately destroyed both Franciscanism and Dominicanism as it had already the older monastic brotherhoods. Yet he did a noble work. He preached peace among political factions; enemies embraced in his presence; gamblers threw away their cards, women cut off their hair or gave their jewels to charity, and men guilty of injustice made restitution at his bidding. He was honoured and loved all over Italy when he died in 1444, aged sixty-four.*

Then in 1461, seventeen years after his death, Agostino of Florence finished this church to his memory in Perugia, carving the old man's features with noble feeling in the stone, with Jesus above him, and on his right and left maidens and children singing the songs of Paradise. Already the good monk was canonised and recognised as one of the inspired. In 1461 it was still believed that the Holy Ghost was in the earth, in this common world of ours, in Italy, in Siena, in good men whose faces and voices were known among the people.

And who was this Agostino of Florence? In the year 1461, Brunelleschi, Ghiberti, Masaccio, and Fra Angelico were all dead, Donatello was old, and Lippo Lippi had only eight years to live. But there was a family of sculptors, then active in Florence, named the Della Robbias, who carried on worthily the traditions of their art. Luca, the eldest, finished the last five panels of Giotto's Campanile, and executed for the Cathedral a lovely group of choristers in marble, and, in terra-cotta, a Resurrection and an Ascension. His nephew Andrea, a youth of seventeen in 1461, afterwards designed the famous children, in terra-cotta, on the loggia of the Hospital of the Innocenti. Vasari says that our Agostino was a brother of Luca; but if this cannot be substantiated, he was certainly his pupil and an inheritor of his genius. The Renaissance movement was growing rapidly in Florence, but the Della Robbias and Agostino, though much affected by the movement, preserved the old Gothic spirit. The Church of St. Bernardino is classical in design, with only here and there a trace of the Gothic; but the carving has all the freedom, the homeliness, the roughness, and the intense expression of the best Gothic sculpture. Agostino has concentrated his powers, as all his great predecessors would have done, on the central figure of the saint and on the angels and cherubs about him, leaving the rest comparatively rough, as if he wished to say: "I want you to look first at my hero and to love him; then at those near him who love him and are made beautiful by their love. After that you may look at the rest, which is not so good, though I hope you will find it beautiful, even the foliage and scroll-work round the door—remembering that if you care for these accessories you must care for my Bernardino much more."

But Perugia has another interest for students of art and religion. Not far from the Church of St. Bernardino is the house of the painter Vanucci, called Perugino, the master of Raphael.

Vanucci was a poor country boy when Agostino was at work on his church. He belonged to one of the Umbrian villages,

* St. Bernardino and St. Francis appear together in a picture by a Perugian artist, Fiorenzo, who survived Raphael, in our National Gallery (No. 1,103). The portrait of St. Bernardino strongly resembles Agostino's sculpture.

* Not monuments such as those in College Square and Carlisle Circus, which perpetuate bitter controversies and stir up strife.

Castello della Pieve, and was brought up in the simple faith of the district. When by hard work and thrift he became an artist and settled in Perugia, he kept this faith, paying little heed to the sceptical notions which came from Rome and Florence, painted in the old ways, and put his whole soul, as Fra Angelico had done, into Madonnas and angels. And by constant toil he produced a type of Madonna which is very grave and refined, and which, as perfected by Raphael, is one of the sacred possessions of Christendom. His portrait, by himself, in Perugia shows us a man with a heavy, unspiritual countenance; but he had a devout heart and a tender delicacy of feeling which won him the reverence of his illustrious pupil.

Raphael Sanzio, the greatest artistic genius, perhaps, that ever lived, was an Umbrian. He was born at Urbino in 1483, the son of a painter and a poet. His mother died before he was nine years old; but we may believe that the boy who became above all others the painter of motherhood, remembered her with affection. After some teaching in Urbino from Timoteo Viti, he went, in the year 1500, aged seventeen, to Perugia to study under Vanucci. He was then an orphan—whence possibly he became the more attached to his master. From Vanucci he learnt to paint his first Madonna, in which we recognise at once the sweet oval face, with high arching brows and downcast eyes, which we associate with his Virgins. Many times he painted it, never satisfied, and always trying to do it better, as if he were painting his mother's portrait and something even holier, something beyond the treasures of earth and the powers of man.

So he worked in the old hill-city, in Vanucci's house, near Agostino's church and Pisano's fountain, for four years, with infinite care and earnestness. Nor is it an accident, I think, that the earliest Madonna we have from his hand includes St. Francis, whose birth-place he must often have looked upon, as Dante had done, from the Porta Sole.

Then in 1504, with an introduction from a great lady of Perugia, who spoke of him as "a discreet and amiable youth," he set out for four further years of study in Florence.

Now, great changes had occurred in Florence between 1461 and 1504. The classical spirit had grown apace. In the work of Botticelli, the pupil of Lippo Lippi, which is as lovely as anything produced by the Florentines, Greek mythology and Christianity are about equally mingled. His Venuses are spiritualised: they are not heathen; but his graceful Virgins have a melancholy beauty which seems to confess that they would rather have a less exalted charge. In Pollajuolo the study of the body superseded that of character; and the two chief Florentine painters of 1504, Leonardo da Vinci and Michael Angelo, were supreme masters of technique, particularly of light and shade and anatomy. Michael Angelo's "David," and his celebrated groups of "Day" and "Night" and "Dawn" and "Twilight," solemn and majestic as they are, are more heathen than Christian, passive rather than yearning, more akin to the philosophic shades of Athens than to the hill of Calvary. In lesser men art had already degenerated with the life of the city under the rule of the profligate Lorenzo di Medici. Public spirit and public patronage had been superseded by the aristocratic. Religious faith was dying. And in 1498 Savonarola, after immense efforts to reform the religion, as well as the morality, politics, and art of Florence, was strangled and burnt in the Piazza Della Signoria.

No doubt Raphael heard much of Savonarola from the painter Fra Bartolommeo, of San Marco, a disciple of the reformer, who, after putting down his brush in grief at his death for four years, took it up again in 1502 to paint his portrait in the character of Peter Martyr. Raphael entered into close and friendly relations with him, and both learnt from him and taught him much. With extraordinary power of assimilation the young artist gathered knowledge right and left from the Florentines—from Masaccio, Leonardo, Michael Angelo, and, above all, Fra Bartolommeo—absorbing what they had to give him without losing his individuality or, as yet, his love for Perugino. He painted more Madonnas than ever, with a new power which set them far above those of his old master, with the same "chaste God-fraught" expression, but heightened and divinely spiritual. It is difficult to make a preference, but of the glorious series of Marias produced in the fervent years 1506–1508, that known as the "Granduca," painted in Florence in 1507 or 1508 for the Grand Duke of Tuscany, Ferdinand III., and held so precious by him that he would never travel without it, now preserved in the Pitti collection, is probably the very finest, and perhaps the noblest product of Raphael's genius,—the culminating example of Madonna-painting in Italy and the whole world. Up to this picture, at any rate, his development had been continuous and almost miraculous, with, as I hope I have sufficiently indicated, the spirit of St. Francis behind it; and here, it might be said, Medievalism and Humanism, Gothicism and Classicism, feeling and technique, combined for their highest utterance, and what Giotto if he had the knowledge, and Andrea del Sarto if he had the soul, would have desired to do, is accomplished.

But in 1508, aged only five-and-twenty, Raphael was invited by the Pope, Julius II., to paint in the Vatican. Scarcely before he could have dreamed of it, the highest honour in art was bestowed upon him, and in an instant he was raised to the pinnacle of worldly success. For the next twelve years, the remaining years of his life, he was enriched, petted, flattered, and overwhelmed with favours. He was treated as a prince, says Vasari, and constantly attended by a troop of artists of ability and distinction. And during these years his genius steadily declined. Gradually the spirit of St. Francis left him and the spirit of the world crept in. He did the bidding of popes and cardinals, some of them men of evil life, robbed, as he confessed, of his liberty but laden with gifts. When one hears of a letter from Raphael, and a fairly long letter, about himself, curiosity and expectation are deeply stirred; but with what miserable disappointment we read, in this almost unique bit of writing, of his property and savings, of the 3,000 gold ducats he has invested, of his income of 600 gold ducats from the Pope and much more for special commissions, of his purchase of a house and expectations of marrying a lady—though he loves another—worth 3,000 dollars, and of the satisfaction he has in Rome and his good fortune!

He had better have been a poor man in Perugia. For though he gathered riches, and outvalled Michael Angelo, and gained immense popularity by his courtesy and gentleness, his religious feeling waned. His former worship of the Virgin Queen slowly departed amid the corruption and scepticism of the Papal Court, and it was not replaced by any other worship. For simple, all-sufficient devoutness of expression, he substituted minor interests, which at length grew sensational and even stagey; and when he returned, as he occasionally did, to his old exalted theme, and painted such lovely things as the Di San Sisto, and the Della Sedia, he left even in these a certain want, which we feel the more when we remember that they were painted in company with frescoes of naked goddesses and portraits of licentious priests.

Of this deterioration I will give one convincing example, his last great picture, on which, it happens, he bestowed particular care in order to redeem some slight falling off of fame. He died suddenly in 1520, of a fever, caught, it is said, whilst excavating some ancient ruins, and aggravated by overwork. There was universal grief, and crowds flocked to see his body lying in his studio in state. At his head was this picture, just finished. It represents the Transfiguration. Jesus and Moses and Elijah are in the air above a rocky eminence, on which the three disciples lie blind and confused in supernatural light.—This is the really beautiful, though not the prominent part of the picture. Two-thirds of the canvas are occupied with the sensational incident of the epileptic boy in Mark ix. 17–18, which is obviously chosen to show skill in the portrayal of violent terror and movement. The lad, with convulsed limbs, yells and rolls his eyes, while his father and mother and the rest of the disciples, in every attitude of excitement, with outstretched arms and legs, entangling draperies and staring countenances, endeavour to pacify him, pointing to Jesus on the mountain.*

Further, the light of the Transfiguration is used for striking effects of chiaroscuro on this group below. The heavenly glory is employed to throw into relief particular bits of good flesh and drapery painting, such as fore-shortened feet and hands, a lady's bare shoulder, St. John's delicate nose, mantle-folds and sleeves, and the eyeball of a terrified Jew.

To such work had the "divine Sanzio" descended in the service of money and fame!

One more point. I said last Sunday that as painting ceases to be religious it loses purity and brightness of colour. This is conspicuous in Raphael. As he surrenders to the pomp and luxury of Rome his pictures are not only strained but dark; and this picture of the Transfiguration, in spite of its subject, is dark. But in one corner there is a little piece of landscape. It is a relic of the influence of Perugino. His old master had taught him how a picture might gain by an outlet into the world beyond, how it served as an escape for the eye and to bring the scene into its right place and proportions as a part of the infinite universe in which we live. We may observe this in many of the best religious pictures, in Perugino's, and in Raphael's of his earlier period. In his later work he often omitted it. He cared less and thought less about the infinite. In this last painting, however, it reappears. But observe: the glimpse he here gives us is not of the pure, far-away landscape of Perugia, once so dear to him, extending to the holy city of St. Francis, and beyond that into calm, eternal light, it is of the country around Rome, a country covered with ruins, with the remains of ancient aqueducts and towers and temples, which speak to us of decay, and of a glory that is gone.

* Of the fifteen visible figures in this group no less than eleven have their arms raised in gesticulation.

THE GROWTH OF CHURCH ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND.—V.

STANDING before the west-end of Lichfield Cathedral, or in the nave of Exeter or York, one might well think that no further development of Gothic architecture was possible. But there were two possible directions which the development of the lines of window tracery might take: either they might run more and more into mere branching and curving lines of stone tracery, regardless of the figures formed by them and the openings thus made for admission of light, or they might run up more and more into perpendicular lines, simplifying the design, and making it more suitable for illustrative stained glass.

On the Continent the first tendency prevailed, resulting in what is known as flamboyant or flaming tracery. In England there are but few examples of this, and no large or very elaborate ones. Amid all their elaboration of design the English architects appear rarely to have forgotten that the purpose of a window is the admission of light, and that to let mere lines of tracery run riot over the whole window, regardless of the forms of the actual openings in the tracery for the admission of light, is to lose all sense of purpose and fitness. In England the lines of the tracery, after a time, tended more and more to run up perpendicularly till they met the curve of the arch, having between them a clear open space, until at last in its completest development the whole window was divided simply by a succession of perpendicular mullions and subsidiary arches. It is from this particular form of window tracery, made up almost entirely of perpendicular lines, that the name of "Perpendicular" has been given to the architecture of the fifteenth century.

The largest and most elaborate windows of this style are the great east windows of York and Gloucester. The window at York is 78 ft. in height and 32 ft. wide. It consists of nine lights, which rise nearly one-fourth of the height, and are then crossed by a transom. At about half the height of the window they are again crossed by a transom. Such is the scale of the window that each of these transoms is in fact a gallery with an arcade in front identical with the tracery of the window; and along these galleries there is ample room to walk to and fro, and so obtain close access to the window itself. About ten or twelve feet above the second transom is the spring of the arch and the tracery proper begins. The lights are grouped three together under three subsidiary arches, and from the centre of each of these springs a mullion. Of these three mullions, the two on each side rise till they meet the main arch, the central one subdivides and forms two superior subsidiary arches with the side of the main arch; but the perpendicular line is continued by a lesser mullion, which only divides just below the centre of the arch so as to form a foliated figure there. From the centre of the arch of each of the nine lights springs a secondary mullion, which rises in each case through the other tracery till it reaches the line of the main arch. Thus the whole of the upper part of the window is subdivided into eighteen lights with subsidiary arches and transoms. There are a few small figures formed by flowing lines in the tracery, but the general effect is entirely of perpendicular lines and arches. The rival east window of Gloucester is not quite so high, but of greater width, being 72 ft. by 38 ft. It consists, like the York window, of nine lights.

More perfect examples, though not so impressive by their mere size, are the east and west windows of Winchester, the latter of which consists of nine lights, not subdivided even in the upper portions, but carried right up to the arch. Such windows are found indeed on a great or small scale throughout the country, belonging as they do to the final effort in church building immediately preceding the Reformation; and Rickman is doubtless right in estimating that "perhaps full half the windows in English edifices over the kingdom are of this style." Most of the cathedrals have a perpendicular window inserted or added in some part or other. The only one that is built in this style throughout is at Manchester, where the fine old collegiate church of the fifteenth century was converted into a cathedral on the foundation of the see in 1848.

The perpendicular lines which mark this period are not confined to the windows. They are found on the tracery and ornament of the buildings throughout. The very buttresses are faced with them; and in such complete examples of perpendicular work as the west-end of Beverley Minster or Winchester Cathedral, the whole front is covered with panelling of the same style.

The three best known complete examples of this style of building are King's College Chapel, Cambridge; St. George's Chapel, Windsor; and Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster. The contrast between this latest period of Gothic architecture and the simple and majestic Early English work is nowhere felt more strongly than when we pass from the choir of Westminster Abbey into Henry the Seventh's Chapel. There is not a square foot of surface left without ornament. The window of fifteen lights at the west end occupies the whole end of the chapel. The clerestory is filled by its four lights on each side, and five in the chancel, so that there is literally no wall left between them, but only a series of piers separating them each from each, and supporting the roof above. The ribs of the groining of the roof spread from these piers fan-like, dividing and subdividing, and covering the whole roof with a mass of fine tracery; the main ribs become flying brackets, ornamented with large crockets, and the bosses huge pendants hanging down seven feet from the roof. Fanciful, perhaps almost too elaborate, but a marvel of lightness and strength, and a maze of beauty and delicate work.

The development of the windows to such an extent as to leave practically no wall between, but only piers insufficient of themselves to support the roof and meet the outward strain, necessitated the use of a buttress placed against each pier, and to bring the line of pressure from the roof into the line of the buttress it was necessary to place an additional weight on the top of the pier itself. This was done by adding pinnacles of solid stone. Thus the elaborate additions to the exterior of the buildings of this period are not mere fanciful adornment, but a necessary part of the structure.

To this last period of English architecture belong the beautiful steeples of many parish churches. They may be recognised at once by their windows and perpendicular ornament. Perhaps the most beautiful is the tower of St. Mary's at Taunton, with its window of five lights over the door, and three pairs of windows rising in successive stories above, the whole surmounted by an elaborately panelled battlement and pinnacles. Others worth very careful study are the tower of Boston in Lincolnshire; All Saints', Derby; the very elaborate tower of Wrexham, and the simpler but very beautiful one at Gresford in Denbighshire.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TRANSVAAL QUESTION.

SIR,—I see from the correspondence in your last issue that objection is being taken to your action in quoting Mr. Frederic Harrison's noble appeal in favour of peace. There must be many who, like myself, consider that action to have been essentially appropriate and right.

The echoes of the Peace Conference are still ringing in our ears. At that Conference we took a leading part, and we joyfully acclaimed its decisions. Yet it is we who are the first of the nations there represented to be again threatening the peace of the world, again on the verge of the old appeal to force. The position is, in any case, a most melancholy one, from which we ought to use every honourable effort to escape.

There are, of course, occasions in which war is forced upon a people, either as the only possible means of fulfilling its solemn obligations, or in defence of its national existence. Can it be said that the present is such an occasion?

We have no doubt obligations to British subjects, not only in the Transvaal, but in all parts of the world. We are bound to protect them as individuals so far as we can, and to exact appropriate redress for wrongs which, as individuals, they may have suffered. Are there not a good many British subjects in Turkey who are still waiting for such redress and compensation?

That, however, is no longer the prominent question in the Transvaal. Our statesmen have thought it wise to seek a solution in a different way, and to ask for such a modification of the internal organisation of the Republic as will enable British subjects to cease to be such, and to take their fortunes into their own hands as citizens of the Republic.

It may be a wise policy, but it is one which we have no possible right to enforce by a display of armed force; no more right than the Russian Government would have to dictate the conditions under which Polish Jews, on arriving in London, shall be admitted to full citizenship here. It is a matter for negotiation and arrangement, and one which, if it cannot be so settled, cannot properly be settled at all.

Our rights of interference in and with the Transvaal, apart from such rights as we have all over the world for the protection of individual British subjects, are definitely settled by treaty, and do not, I believe, include a right to force upon it citizens whom it is unwilling to receive as such. Reliance is placed upon discussions and alleged promises made, not indeed upon the occasion of the last treaty, but of the abrogated one, which preceded it. When arrangements, whether between individuals or nations, are being reduced into writing and given a definite form, it is the business of those who are responsible to see that nothing to which they attach importance is omitted.

If we wanted to control the Franchise Law in the Republic, we ought to have made appropriate stipulations in our treaty.

But we are told that the interests of the Empire are at stake, and will suffer vitally if our supremacy in South Africa be not asserted. To suzerainty in a legal sense we have just so much right as the London Convention gives us, and no more. Whether the rights thereby given to us are properly described as suzerainty or not is an idle question of words. The particular word is highly offensive to the Boers. Why use it? Our treaty rights remain the same, whatever name we give them, and the Boers have explicitly declared their willingness to recognise and respect those rights. If there is a doubt about the interpretation of them, arbitration is the appropriate method for settling that doubt.

Supremacy is a more vague, and therefore a more convenient, term under which to justify our action. British supremacy is an undoubted and, on the whole, a beneficent fact in large areas of the world; but let us ask ourselves upon what does and must it ultimately rest? Not upon force of arms. With our limited military resources it is absurd to suppose that it could do so. It does and must rest upon good government; just dealing, a scrupulous regard for the sentiments of the people affected, and a resulting conviction on the part of those who are subject to it that on the whole it works for their good. It is by inspiring such a conviction, and not by threats of war and appeals to mere force, that we can alone establish a real and permanent supremacy in South Africa.

The nations desire peace and justice. So the great Conference seems to prove. Yes! but, at the same time, they are all apt to be led away by their own peculiar phrases and shibboleths, and to become, for the time, blind to their own higher ideals. With sorrow we turn our eyes to France to-day, and see how a great people can be misled by false ideas of honour and glory, by an unintelligent patriotism, and a dislike of the Jews and their ways. For "honour and glory" substitute "Trade and British interests"; for "patriotism," "Empire"; for "Jews," "Boers"; and then let us ask ourselves what kind of comment might not a thoughtful and not unfriendly Frenchman make upon us to-day.

A large section of our press and people are rapidly succumbing to the hateful war fever, and it is for Journals like yours, Sir, to do what they can to promote a nobler spirit and a more calm consideration of the question. JOHN DENDY.

Sept. 10.

SIR,—Re your replies to Mr. F. T. Reed and Dr. Vance Smith, that your references have never denied the grievances of the Uitlanders, and that "both sides of the question are found abundantly in the daily newspapers," I have not hitherto read any admission by you of these grievances, and the violation of treaty obligations, or any comments other than in favour of Mr. Kruger and the Boers; the entire spirit of your articles seems to place the criminal responsibility of a Transvaal war to the discredit of the British Government. J. MORR.

King's Heath, Sept. 10.

[Our notes of last week distinctly admitted that the grievances of the Uitlanders are real, and should be redressed. As to war, if it comes, our clear conviction is that the disgrace of it will rest on this country—which God forbid!—ED. INQ.]

SIR,—Few who have read your issue of Sept. 9 will deny that one-sided opinion on the Transvaal affair has been therein sufficiently represented. Your comments on the letters of Mr. Reed and Dr. Vance Smith seem, to "us," adequate and courteous. With an admirable sense of fitness you leave the self-sacrificing utterances of "H. Tero" to shriek for themselves. Perhaps you will admit from the other side a few sentences which make no pretence to impartiality? "Some or many" of your readers think that while the Uitlanders are doubtless suffering hardships—"tolerable and not to be endured"—yet these grievances belong largely to the circumstances of all gold-seekers who go where they are not wanted to serve their private ends; and we are convinced that war, to cure such troubles, would simply be vitriol poured upon a wounded surface. "Some or many" contend, moreover, that inasmuch as at the present moment every corner of the planet shows symptoms of unstable equilibrium and suppressed inflammation, the general peace might easily be in a moment exploded by a less shock than this attack of "ten men armed to the teeth on one man in his shirt"—to borrow the comparison adapted by Mr. Morley from Swift. "Some or many" even think that the Great Powers who are credited with a desire to crush "perfidious Albion"—whenever occasion serves—might find, in the monstrous inequality of this war between a Mammoth and a Mouse, a better occasion—that is, when the Mammoth is in a fix!—than could have been given by that hint to Yildis Kiosk, two years ago, that would have saved countless myriads of lives, along with British honour. In conclusion, "Some or many" maintain that every one, for whom the humanity of Jesus Christ has a heartfelt meaning and a week-day application, must see that no case of justice and necessity can be made out for this war with the Transvaal, for compelling the Boers, with Maxim guns and repeating rifles, to amend their franchise. Patience is the word: patience—so hard for the Bully and the Jingo—patience must have its perfect work. If not—it is my absolute conviction—a deeper stain will blot the fame of the British people, even than that which, alas! is now darkening the robes of our sister nation.

WILLIAM H. HERFORD.

Yeabridge, Somerset, Sept. 12.

SIR,—The restiveness of your correspondents is not much to be wondered at, and it is not my intention to add to it. I only wish to correct Mr. Tero's history. He suggests that a military conflict with the Republic might be preferable to "renunciation of British suzerainty over the Transvaal." But that renunciation was complete in 1884. It is not a matter for argument. It is the clearest possible bit of history. The old suzerain Convention was expressly ended in 1884 at the Colonial Office, when Lord Derby deliberately acceded to the request of the Transvaal Government, deleted suzerainty with his own hand, and formed a new Convention, modelled from beginning to end on independence, with no reservation except a provision relating to foreign treaties. To bring up suzerainty again is an insolence or an attempt at fraud. J. PAGE HOPPS.

RELIGIOUS REFORM IN ITALY.

SIR,—Apropos of the mention of the work of Don Miraglia in Piacenza, quoted from the National Review in your last issue, it may be of interest to your readers to know that Signor Bracciforti, of Milan, wrote to me for a copy of my little Catechism, with the special view of translating it for use by Don Miraglia. On its receipt he wrote me as follows:—

"I read it with very great interest, and I can only say that the reading did surpass my fondest expectations, having found the Catechism most admirable and suggestive in its simplicity; full of logical sequence, and commending itself powerfully to the reason and conscience of the reader.

"My beloved daughter, Zaira, whom I find a great help and comfort in my work, has insisted on my letting her take upon herself this Italian translation as a labour of love; which, of course, I was delighted to grant, being persuaded that she can do it more charmingly than myself. She has already translated a portion, and my impression is, that I shall have very little indeed, if anything, to alter."

It will be a great joy to me if my little effort should help on so much needed a reformation of religious thought in Italy.

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL EDUCATION LEAGUE.

SIR,—May I be permitted to call the attention of your readers resident in or within sixty miles of the metropolis who may be wishful to arrange for lectures or courses of lectures in their localities, to the advantages gratuitously offered by the Social and Political Education League. This society was founded more than twenty years ago by the late Sir John Seeley and the Rev. H. Solly. The Bishop of London is the retiring president, and the Right Hon. Sir M. E. Grant Duff is his successor. A copy of the lecture list for 1899-1900 may be obtained on application to the organising secretary, Mr. A. H. Reed, 23, Old-square, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

CHAS. E. HECHT, Hon. Sec.
3, Essex-court, Temple, E.C., Sept. 11.

P.S.—We have also branches at Oxford, Cambridge, Sheffield and Leeds, concerning which I shall be pleased to supply information.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, the foundation of the late Philip Barker, of Nantwich, is in course of erection, and is to be opened in September, 1900, with Mr. Guy Lewis, M.A., late Scholar of Pembroke College, Oxford, as Head Master. The foundation stone of the School buildings is to be laid by Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., on Thursday week, Sept. 28, at one o'clock, the buildings being on the Grove Estate, formerly the founder's residence, about a mile from Nantwich Station, and three and a-half miles from Crewe. The estate, which consists of twenty-one acres of park-like land, is quite in the country, in a healthy situation, with good water supply, and the buildings will stand on a sub-soil of gravel and sand.

The buildings, including the Head Master's house, will be quadrangular, enclosing a court, and there will be a covered playground, workshop, gymnasium, and cycle-house. Dormitory accommodation will, in the first instance, be provided for forty boys. When the numbers exceed sixty, a second house will be built, in another part of the estate. There will be good playing fields.

The following passages we quote from the prospectus:—

"Willaston School will provide a sound liberal education on public school lines. Provision will be made for teaching religious knowledge, classics, modern languages, history and geography, English language and literature, mathematics, and natural science.

"To the treatment of the first-named subject great importance will be assigned. The boys will be instructed in the history of the growth of religious and rational theological thought and opinion in England, and generally in religious subjects, and will be encouraged in sobriety, intelligence, earnestness, and piety, and in modes and by teachers free from the obligations of prescribed creeds or tests of religious belief.

"Careful and individual attention will be given to the physical training and development of the boys."

[The School will be divided into a classical and a modern side, the instruction in the lower forms, including elementary science, being the same for all.]

"There will be daily morning prayer, and a religious service in the School on Sunday. Special attention will be paid to the religious and moral education of the boys.

If any parent or guardian should, in writing, request the head master that his or her son or ward might be exempted from attending prayers or religious services or worship, or lessons on religious history or on any other religious subjects, such son or ward (if not on the foundation) shall be exempted accordingly, without being deprived of any other advantage of the School.

[The fees are stated as £100 per annum, or £33 6s. 8d. a term (inclusive) for boarders, and £12 12s. a term for day boys.]

"In accordance with the wishes of the founder, provision will be made for a certain number of boys as foundationers, for whom the fees will only be one-half the full fees. These founder's exhibitions are available in the case of a boy whose parent or guardian was, at the time of the boy's admission to the School, a minister or a member of some congregation in England stately assembling for the public worship of God, and imposing no obligation upon any member thereof (whether minister, member, or otherwise) to subscribe or assent to any articles or article of religious belief or to submit to any test of religious doctrine. But the governing body in all cases to have power to decide, in their absolute and uncontrollable discretion, whether any parent or guardian was or was not a member of any such congregation as aforesaid; with power also to admit the sons or wards of persons who might be personally in full sympathy with, although they respectively might not actually be members for the time being of any such congregation as aforesaid."

The governors of the School are the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., H. E. Dowson, B.A., W. H. Drummond, B.A., Henry Gow, B.A., P. M. Higginson, M.A., J. E. Odgers, M.A., and S. A. Steinthal, Messrs. R. D. Darbishire, H. P. Greg, M.A., Richard D. Holt, C. S. Jones, M.A., G. H. Leigh, Harry Rawson, J.P., Russell Scott, and A. H. Worthington, B.A. The last-named is also secretary of the School, and the clerk is Mr. E. W. Marshall, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

THE Friends' Summer School closes to-day at Birmingham, with a morning hour for worship. We are glad to hear that the meetings have been eminently successful, and the lectures rich in interest and stimulus. Full reports are to appear in The Friend of Sept. 15 and the three following weeks (Messrs. Headley Bros., 14, Bishopsgate-street Without, E.C., 1d. weekly), and the British Friend for October will also contain a record (W. E. Turner, Colwyn Bay, 6d. a copy). The evening lectures included an address by J. Wilhelm Rowntree on "The Responsibilities of a Free Ministry," lectures by W. C. Braithwaite, LL.B., B.A., and Edward Grubb, M.A., on "Development of Christian Morality" (pre-Reformation and modern, respectively), and a series of "Studies in Personal Spiritual Illumination," which included "Tauler and Boehme," by Joan M. Fry, "Isaac Pennington," by J. W. Graham, M.A., "Madame Guyon," by Dr. J. E. Harris, and "Terstegen," by Horace E. Govan, M.A. Some of these lectures will no doubt be subsequently published in book form, as in [the case of the Scarborough School, two years ago, and we trust that these "Studies" will be included in the volume.

It should not seem to be so very wonderful a thing that men should attain to the ability to say, "I am willing to die. . . ." It seems to me a much grander, better, and nobler thing to say, "I am willing and ready to live, right here, to-day, in my circumstances: ready to take up my burden, to carry my load, to do my work, to wait God's time."—M. J. Savage.

RAIN AFTER LONG DROUGHT.

Descend ye sparkling drops and cool the earth,
In her sad dearth!
See how the sunburnt flowers look up to thee,
So thankfully.

Descend, and let thy crystal stream fill up
Each tiny cup.
Sweet, grateful glances from all things arise
To greet the skies.

Fountain of Life! which flows so fresh, so free,
We'll drink of Thee.
Who draws from Thee can never take in vain,
Nor thirst again.

Sprinkle with grace the germs of faith which rest
Within each breast;
Bid them to spring, unfold and blossom fair,
And good fruit bear.

Thou Source of All! we cannot speak the praise
Our hearts would raise;
We may but kneel and silently adore
Thee evermore.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Buxton.—The 174th anniversary was held on Sunday last, when sermons were preached by the Rev. G. Street, the resident minister, the subject in the morning being "Nonconformity in the Christian Church," and in the evening "The Unitarian Aspect of Nonconformity." There were very fair congregations and good hearty services. The collections, however, and donations from friends for church and school expenses were disappointing, being considerably less than last year.

Guildford.—Last Sunday evening, after a brief devotional service, conducted by the minister, the congregation of Ward-street Church had the happiness of hearing an admirably interesting and, in certain passages, a singularly picturesque and poetic lecture, entitled "Islam, an Historical Sketch," from Mr. Alfred J. Robertson, formerly of Tunbridge Wells. Mr. Robertson has had the advantage of residing in Constantinople, Damascus, and other Mohammedan cities, and also of having travelled throughout that region which may be termed Mohammedan India, and, therefore, of seeing the practical effect of the moral and spiritual influence of the Islamic faith. The dissertation was rendered the more pleasing in that the lecturer, whilst passing over the many faults, dwelt generously upon the too often neglected and even quite forgotten virtues of the Turk.

Horsham.—The report of the Free Christian Church, presented to the annual meeting on Aug. 3 and since printed, showed satisfactory results from the year's work, and a balance on the right side. Reference was made to the loss sustained in the death of Miss Agate, and other friends. Cordial acknowledgment was made of the services rendered by the Rev. J. J. Marten and Mrs. Marten.

Leigh: Lancashire.—Very successful harvest festival services were held here on Sunday last, when the Rev. A. H. Dolphin preached to large congregations, that in the evening quite filling the church. The decorations were very choice, and had been tastefully displayed by the ladies who took part in the work. A sale of fruit, &c., was held on Monday evening, and this, together with the offertories on Sunday, realised £6 6s. 4d.

Liscard.—The arrangements for the opening of the new church are practically completed. There will be a preliminary meeting on Saturday, Sept. 30, at 5.45 P.M., when addresses will be delivered by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., V. D. Davis, B.A., Priestley Prime, and others. At 6.30 the first public service will be held in the new church. The devotional service will be conducted by Mr. Davis, assisted by the Rev. J. H. Gwyther, B.A., of the Liecard Congregational Church. The Rev. E. P. Barrow, M.A., of Manchester, will give the address. The Sunday services will be conducted by the minister, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and the sermons will be preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham. At a meeting of the Governing Body, held on Sunday last, it was decided to call the new church The Memorial Church, Lisard.

London: Deptford.—On Sunday evening last we held our first service in the Alliance Temperance Hall, Albury-street, the use of which has kindly been granted by the committee during the renovation of our chapel. The work is now in operation, and will, we hope, be completed in five or six weeks. In addition to the amount already received, a sum of £60 is still required, and contributions are earnestly solicited that the cost may be forthcoming on the completion of the work, so that our congregation may be relieved from the burden of debt.

London: Hampstead.—Sunday last Dr. Herford resumed the pulpit after his vacation, and preached in the morning on the subject of "War," with special reference to all the talk of war in the Transvaal. He was no non-resistant. He believed Christ's strong sayings of love and kindness to enemies were words of kindness and forbearance against personal enmity and wrong, and did not touch the great world-question of government, with force at the base and woven in the very thread and texture of it. There were worse things even than war. He believed that some of the world's struggles for independence had been among the noblest chapters in history. But this war was all, for what? Local injustices, alleged grievances, which even if ever so clearly established were surely no ground for talk of war! Take them at their utmost valuation—discussions about taxes and franchise—compared with the terrible oppressions which had nerved the struggles of history, mere township squabbles! Of course that was no reason for not working to have them righted, but to talk of war about them seemed shocking and horrible. Of course it might be a slow process to get redress in the legal way, but what were a few years compared with the horrors and long hatreds of a war? About the details he would say no word, but all talk of war about them was as ridiculous in the perspective and proportion of history as it was wrong on any interpretation of Christianity. He appealed to all to give their word and influence for peace and kindly patience.

Newchurch.—On Sunday, Sept. 10, after an interval of some years, harvest thanksgiving services were revived. The work of decorating the church was skilfully carried out, and with pleasing effect. Two sermons were preached by the Rev. J. J. Shaw, B.A., to large congregations. Instead of the introductory part of the evening service, a sacred cantata, entitled "The Rolling Seasons," was rendered by the choir. A fruit banquet was held on Monday night. The entire proceeds amounted to £18 3s.

Northampton.—Last Sunday morning the Rev. John Byles preached in Kettering-road Church on "The Transvaal—War or Peace?" Having traced the history of events up to the present crisis, and insisted that by the Treaty of 1852 and the Conventions of 1881 and 1884 the British Government had guaranteed the Boers against interference with their internal affairs, he said it was a case of Naboth's vineyard over again. The capitalists and money-makers coveted the land which had proved to be rich beyond the dreams of avarice. But if war should not be averted it would bring many disasters in its train. It would be not only a blunder, but a crime.

Stalybridge.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held on Sunday last, the preacher being the Rev. W. Harrison. The church was tastefully decorated with flowers, fruits, and vegetables. There were large congregations, and the collections were larger in amount than for several years past.

HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

PRINCIPALS—Miss J. F. GRUNER (Certif. Student of Girton College), Moorcroft, Hindhead, Surrey.

Miss MACRAE MOIR (Cambridge Higher Local), Lingholt, Hindhead, Surrey.

The aim of the School is to combine the advantages of a good Boarding School with a thorough Education and healthy outdoor life. Girls may be prepared for College-entrance and other examinations.

The district of Hindhead is one of the healthiest parts of England, and much recommended by doctors for its bracing air and gravel soil.

Miss MOIR receives ten boarders in a thoroughly well-built modern house, with southern aspect. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. References allowed to parents of present and past pupils.

Terms for Board and Education on application to the Principals.

NEXT TERM begins September 19th.

THE LAWN, DISS, NORFOLK.

Mrs. LAWSON, assisted by fully qualified English and French Governesses, receives a limited number of Young Ladies as Resident and Daily Pupils.

Individual Tuition, given in addition to the work done in class, is a special feature, there being a sufficient number of experienced teachers to secure for each pupil the necessary attention.

There is a good garden, with tennis lawn, and great attention is paid to out-of-school engagements.

The domestic arrangements are those of a private family; combining, with the discipline of a well-regulated school, the freedom and moral influences which are peculiar to home life.

The ordinary Course of Study includes French, Music, Singing, Science, and the usual English subjects.

The school year is divided into three nearly equal terms, which begin about January 21st, May 1st, and September 20th respectively.

Fees are payable in advance, and a term's notice or fees required before the removal of a Pupil.

INCLUSIVE FEES.—Boarders: For Pupils under twelve years of age, 40 guineas per annum; for Pupils above twelve years of age, 50 guineas per annum.

THE WARREN, KNOTSFORD.

THE BIBLE FOR HOME READING.

Edited with Comments and Reflections for the use of Jewish Parents and Children. By C. G. MONTEFIORE. Second Part. Containing Selections from the Wisdom Literature, the Prophets, and the Psalter, together with Extracts from the Apocrypha.

Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

British Weekly.—“Although primarily intended for the use of Jewish homes, Mr. Montefiore's edition of the Bible cannot fail to find its way into the hands of Christian parents. These will find in it much to instruct and much to edify. . . . If in some respects readers are likely to differ from his judgments, they will certainly recognise that this is a felicitous and instructive method of dealing with the Bible.”

THE BOOK OF BANDER.

A Scripture-form Story of Past and Present Times. By the Author of the “New Koran.” Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

It records the efforts of a “Church of Cofriends” to correct ancient errors, to reconcile the Jews, Christians, and Moslems of Syria on the basis of pure Theism, and generally to promote amity among all groups and grades of mankind in spite of their natural differences. The broad-minded will most respect its teaching, and there is reason to believe that it will be appreciated and found useful by reformers of various schools who have been favourably impressed with its companion work in scriptural style and arrangement.

“The New Koran is exactly the opposite of the Book of Mormon. Its narratives are short and varied, interesting and life-like, and there is not a page or paragraph without its useful lessons. It is as readable as ‘Robinson Crusoe,’ and as instructive as Theodore Parker's Sermons. . . . Young and old, rich and poor, rulers and subjects, may read it with equal pleasure and equal profit.”—Barker's Review.

“He speaks through the mouth of one Jaido Morata, who is a preacher calling all religionists to a sense of brotherly feeling, denouncing their vices and follies, and exhorting them to pursue the path of rectitude. The work is eminently readable, is far from being pedantic or dogmatic, and displays an amount of keen reflection which proves the writer to be an astute thinker and profound observer of the actions and thoughts of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans.”—Jewish World.

“It is an exquisite and delicate instrument for the healing of men's strifes and for combining an untiring energy towards progress with a grateful contentment under the difficulties and troubles of life. . . . May we all do our best to learn for ourselves, and then teach to others the lovely lessons of truth and virtue which this book contains, so that we and they may reach that region of sound and calm judgment where the follies and frailties of our childhood cannot follow us.”—Sermon by the Rev. C. Voysey.

“We very sincerely trust that its diffusion will not be retarded by what a liberal mind ought to regard as the eminent merit of sturdy independence of all the reigning schools of thought. . . . Objective, dramatic, impressive, aphoristic, pregnant with thought and transparent in expression, it has every requisite for public recitation, while far more than a ‘forty parson power’ of homilising would be needed to exhaust its manifold suggestiveness.”—Review by Dr. Richard Garnett.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE notice that the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to preach at Little Portland-street on a series of Sunday mornings, beginning Oct. 8, has evidently been widely welcomed, a very large number of tickets to ensure seats having been applied for. It may be useful to repeat that these tickets can only be obtained by writing to the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, Strand, and that they should be applied for not later than Oct. 5.

THE decision of the clergy at St. Alban's Church, Holborn, in the matter of the use of incense, has been awaited with some interest. There were the proverbial three courses open to them. They might either follow the advice of some of the Ritualist leaders, and act in accordance with the Archbishop's "opinion" against the ceremonial use of incense, but only so far as the strict letter of the law, breaking it in substance as much possible; or they might show their conscientious attachment to incense by defying the authority of the Archbishop and Bishop. Of these two courses the latter seems by far the more honourable, though it would clash with the vow of obedience. The St. Alban's clergy have followed the third course of obeying their superiors, in good faith; but it is not a little significant that the advertisement placed in the church to that effect adds that the change is only "till further notice."

By "pardoning" Captain Dreyfus the French Government have done all in their power to condemn the monstrous verdict returned at Rennes. It was, indeed, self-condemned already; for as everyone said, if the prisoner was the traitor that the Generals swore they believed him to be, it was absurd to speak of extenuating circumstances; and in unanimously recommending the omission of a second ceremony of "degradation" the Court-martial further showed its distrust of its own verdict. The Government has its hands full in many ways, and if it could get rid of l'affaire by this stroke it might congratulate itself. For the poor victim of persecuting malice the event closes a long and bitter chapter of suffering—may he and his have compensating joys in their reunion! One thought breaks uppermost amidst the conflicting feelings of the hour, it is the thought that truth is strong after all, and does prevail. Honour to the brave men who have, at all risks and costs, brought so much of the truth to light, and who, by fighting against the most tremendous odds, have rescued the hated Jew from his living grave!

WE are living in the midst of alarms, and every day brings its fresh rumour as to the certainty, nearer or more remote, of war with the Transvaal Republic. Readers know our opinion on the reasons offered by the militant party for pursuing a war policy; we are confident that the majority of our brethren are heartily with us in believing such a war would be a shocking event in our history, and that it would have dire consequences long after the actual fighting was over. That some of our brethren hold other views must be admitted, and we present this week several letters exhibiting the variety of opinion that exists. Unless we are mistaken every day that passes without an outbreak tends towards a pacific settlement, after all. The shouters and jingoes have had the field so long that our statesman might be excused if they thought the feeling of the country demanded a settlement by the sword—which would be no settlement. The voices of sense and prudence, though few and isolated, must at last be heard; and we would trust that such voices are within the Cabinet itself. Despite the dispatch of troops we cling to the hope that Great Britain can show herself greatest in this—while having the power to strike, yet having the wisdom to use only the weapons of reason.

IN the rapidly-developing town of Ipswich we have one of the historic chapels of our body, almost in the condition in which it was built—with many qualms of conscience and some fear of the future—in 1700. Daniel Defoe, in his "Tour through the Eastern Counties in 1722," described it as being "as large and as fine a building of the kind as most on this side of England, and the inside the best finished of any I have seen, London not excepted." It still possesses a massive brass chandelier of splendid design, and a pulpit of beautiful carving and proportions. But after the lapse of 200 years the general appearance has grown tawdry, and its discomfort deters many from repeating a first visit. The chapel was opened by John Fairfax, one of the Suffolk Bartholomeans; its walls have resounded to the voice of Dr. Priestley, who was minister for a time at the neighbouring town of Needham Market. Here the Rev. Thomas Scott ministered and wrote the hymns "All seeing God, 'tis thine to know" and "The uplifted eye, the bended knee"; here the Rev. Robert Lewin preached, who afterwards, at Liverpool, opened the present building in Renshaw-street; and here also the Rev. Wm. Wood ministered, till he succeeded Dr. Priestley at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds.

THE congregation, with a mixture of audacity and enthusiasm, has determined to celebrate the Bi-centenary, by taking steps to renovate and preserve the building. At a meeting held on Sunday last the following resolution was passed unanimously :—

That the congregation and friends, worshipping in St. Nicholas' Old Meeting House, having adopted the committee's recommendations as to the best method of celebrating the Bi-centenary of the present building, including repairs and improvements calculated to cost at least £1,500, hereby earnestly pledge themselves to raise as much of that sum as possible.

Having regard, however, to the limited ability and numbers of the congregation, and to the fact that the cause at Ipswich is one of the few upon which the whole movement in East Anglia is dependent, they appeal confidently to their fellow-religionists throughout the country to help them in preserving and in adapting to modern requirements their venerable House, while lovingly keeping its historical character.

THE last annual report of the Commons Preservation Society, with which is now amalgamated the National Footpath Preservation Society, tells of the formation last year of a "Parliamentary Amenities Committee," by which curious title is denoted a committee of members of Parliament, which shall be charged with watching those public interests to which the above societies, together with the National Trust, the Kyrle, the Selborne, and other societies are devoted. The secretary of the Commons Preservation Society has been appointed hon. secretary of the Parliamentary committee, which will meet at the office of the society, 1, Great College-street, Westminster. An article in the Spectator, referring to this subject, and the great services such a Parliamentary committee might render, contained the following passage :—

A nation which does not care for its past, it has been said, is not likely to enjoy any future. This is true enough, but the past means more than that which we sum up under the name of history. It means not only the nation's past deeds, bards, and heroes, it means not only Alfred and Shakespeare and Bunyan, not only Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, but it also means the soil of the land and the monuments transmitted to us by our ancestors. "This blessed plot of earth, this realm, this England" is not merely a land of literature and science, not merely a stage for the enacting of great human dramas, it is also a land of much and varied physical beauty, and a land full of noble remains which illustrate the story of the past. We are all of us trustees for these remains and for this beauty, and we have no more right to relax the utmost vigilance in their preservation than we have in neglecting the poetry of Shakespeare or the science of Newton. This seems to us to be the spirit in which the preservation of national beauty should be approached and cultivated, and it will be a melancholy prospect for the nation if ever this spirit fades away.

THE Rev. S. Fletcher Williams has contributed to the Indian Mirror, a Calcutta daily, two articles—one on "Darwin and Emerson," and another on "Theism and Agnosticism in Relation to Morality." Three literary articles from his pen appear in the Calcutta University Magazine—one on "Massinger and Ford," and two entitled "Notes on 'Paradise Lost,'" certain books of Milton's epic forming part of the English Literature subjects at the next University examinations.

A SOBER VIEW.

At a Conference of Churchmen, convened in consequence of the gravity of the present Church crisis, by the Rev. Professor Ryle, D.D., the Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies, D.D., the Right Hon. Sir John Kennaway, M.P., and the Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe, and held at the Royal United Service Institution, Whitehall, on Friday, April 28, 1899, the Bishop of Hereford being in the chair, the following resolutions were adopted nemine contradicente:—

"1. We who are assembled at this Meeting of Churchmen, being distressed and anxious on account of the dangers that so seriously threaten the continued welfare of our reformed branch of the Catholic Church, do hereby pledge ourselves to co-operate in maintaining by all lawful and Godly means its Protestant and comprehensive character, and to guard and cherish the great heritage of religious freedom and progress secured to the English people at the Reformation, enriched by three centuries of Anglican life and thought, and now held in trust by our generation for the spiritual, moral, and intellectual well-being of those who are to come after us.

"2. Believing that the Real Presence of our Lord in the Sacrament of His Body and Blood is a purely spiritual presence, and that no other is recognised by the formularies of the Church of England, we hold it to be the duty of all Churchmen to save the Church, as far as in them lies, from the endeavours which are being made by a section of the clergy to bring back an unscriptural and materialistic doctrine of the Holy Communion, and a ritual hardly, if at all, distinguishable from that of the Roman Mass repudiated at the Reformation.

"3. We hold it to be the duty of all true and faithful members of the Church to maintain the teaching of the Prayer-book as to confession and absolution, and to discourage and oppose by all lawful means the introduction into our parishes and homes of any system of habitual confession to a priest, or of the misleading and dangerous doctrine that the practice of auricular confession is either necessary or generally helpful to the maintenance of a healthy Christian life; and we most earnestly appeal to the Bishops to prevent, as far as in them lies, any clergyman of our Church from taking advantage of his position to press it, as a rule of life, upon the young or the ignorant.

"4. The practice of reservation of the consecrated elements being in our opinion contrary to the formularies of the English Church, we earnestly appeal to the Bishops to enforce the prohibition of it contained in the Prayer-book and obviously implied in the Articles.

"5. We are of opinion that it is for the true interests of the Established Church that the final determination of ecclesiastical causes should continue to rest with Her Majesty in Council; and we deplore, and will oppose, the pretension put forward by a section of Churchmen that the law of the Church in spiritual matters is to be authoritatively interpreted by the clerical order alone."

A first list of those who have signified their assent to these resolutions has now been published, containing over 500 names, of whom, roughly speaking, 300 are clergy and the rest laymen. Among the signatories, in addition to the above-named, are Lord Aberdare, Sir W. H. Broadbent, M.P., Sir T. Powell Buxton, F. A. Channing, M.P., Sir Edward Clarke, M.P., Sir Joshua Fitch, Sir Walter Foster, M.P., Sydney Gedge, M.P., the Earl of Harrowby, Lord Heneage, Henry Hobhouse, M.P., Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth, M.P., Sir John Lubbock, M.P., Sir William Markby, Sir William Muir, Principal Reichel, Sir Richard Temple, the heads of several Oxford and Cambridge Colleges, and of Public Schools, including Charterhouse, Uppingham, and Sedbergh, the Deans of Canterbury, Bristol, Gloucester, Norwich, St. Davids, Salisbury, and Ripon, Canon Ainger, Master of the Temple, Canon Barnett, Canon Cheyne, the Rev. Brooke Lambert, the Rev. R. H. Charles, D.D., and other well-known clergymen.

BEDFORD COLLEGE, LONDON, FOR WOMEN.—Bedford College opens Thursday, Oct. 5. Students attend on Wednesday, Oct. 4, between 2 and 4 P.M., to interview the Principal and Lecturers. The Inaugural Address for the Session 1899-1900 will be given on Tuesday, Oct. 10, at 4.30 P.M., by A. W. Ward, Litt.D. Subject: "Some Suggestions of the Renaissance." At the Intermediate Examinations of the London University, held in July last, the following students of Bedford College were successful:—Arts: Honours, 3rd class in English and Logic, E. L. Calkin; 1st division, M. A. Baiber, A. Corcos, S. G. Ellis, S. E. Hazleton, M. E. Leathley; 2nd division, L. M. Brooks, R. M. Freeman, L. E. Giddings, M. L. H. Leach, E. F. Payne, M. O. Robinson, H. Williams. Logic only: M. A. Borrow, W. B. Cuthbertson, J. P. Dunlop. Science: 1st division, F. M. Carter, C. M. Gibson, H. L. M. Pixell, W. E. Watts, E. M. S. Weekley; 2nd division, E. V. Armitage, M. S. G. Breeze, E. Coates, E. S. de J. Le Pelley (laboratory work only at Bedford College), A. M. Newton, I. M. Stewart, J. S. Young. Pre. Science: E. G. Kensington (completing certificate).

"A MAN WHO REFUSED A MILLION DOLLARS."

A STORY under this title appeared in Tit-Bits last week, and purports to be a true account of some of the doings of Mr. J. Eads How, in connection with a legacy left him by his father.

Mr. J. Eads How spent two years (1896-97) at Manchester College, and during his residence in Oxford he made a name for himself by founding the Institute in Charles-street, St. Ebbes.

It was in our friend's first year that he was summoned to St. Louis, Mo., to attend his father's funeral. Mr. How had been vice-president of an American railroad, and died a wealthy man, leaving Eads a million dollars; so Tit-Bits says. Now, the story is that he positively refuses to accept that money or any portion of it, notwithstanding the efforts of his mother and brother to induce him to be human, and that he has "left his palatial home in Lindell Boulevard, the most fashionable park thoroughfare in St. Louis, to take up quarters and lead a life of voluntary poverty in one of the most squalid portions of the city—Little Russia."

Those who have had the great pleasure of J. Eads How's close friendship would not be at all surprised if this were a fact, for, in vacation from Oxford, he used to spend most of his days and all his nights in the atmosphere of the fourpenny lodging-houses of Blackfriars or Canning Town.

Here he was found, neither seeking nor getting appreciation, in personal discomfort, privation, and filth. His whole nature was in agony over the civilisation which could permit fellow-creatures to exist in such abject conditions. He was not troubled about people giving piles of money to solve the difficulties, but he strongly insisted that people should give themselves to their less fortunate brethren. Though he never ceased to protest against the hardships of the poor and vicious, yet he laid much greater stress upon the fact that splendid opportunities to do good were at hand. Here, in London, he realised, in some degree, the dreams of his Harvard days, when he withdrew from "Society," and of his later Meadville days when he fairly longed to go to the "masses."

It is thus seen that Mr. J. Eads How has, for the last ten years at least, been "giving himself to the people." Since his return to the United States he has spent the greater portion of his time in the work of the Mission connected with the Church of the Messiah, St. Louis, where the Rev. John Snyder is minister. The present writer received a letter from him less than a week ago wherein he gives interesting details of the "Brotherhood" in which he and some other Meadville men are concerned. If there is any truth in the story about his refusing the fortune it has to do with another matter with which our friend's paternal grandfather was connected. Mr. J. Eads How maintains that certain moral obligations—not legal—arising from his grandfather's business relations devolve upon the family. In this he and his own father were not agreed. W. C. P.

THOREAU AND HIS TEACHING.—I.

In his lecture on "The Transcendentalist," Emerson has left us an apology for social life. Surely we could find no abler apologist; yet we are not interested as we expect. For the idealist he portrays we do not recognise. There is a sort of life-likeness about the portrait that forbids us to think it imaginary; but where are now the "intelligent and religious persons who withdraw from the common" concerns of social life, and "betake themselves to a solitary and critical way of living"—"who are striking work and crying out for something worthy to do"—who shun society, yet cherish the noblest ideal of love and friendship—who do not willingly share in the public charities, the public religious rites, or the enterprises of education, but incline to shut themselves up, to live in the country, to love Nature, and "find an indemnity in the inviolable order of the world for the violated order and grace of man"? Idealists we all know, but they are hard at work striving to realise their ideals. An ideal seems to us the most powerful of all incentives to work, common ideals the most sacred bond between man and man. There is something alien, perhaps Oriental, about Emerson's "Transcendentalist"—withdrawn into the solitude of Nature—apart from men—given up to thoughts and raptures—exalting worship, but despising work. Was Emerson really describing a class, or some eccentric genius among his personal acquaintance? Perhaps both. Not far from his own home in Concord dwelt a man in whom we cannot fail to recognise the original of this portrait—a man loved by Emerson, but often an object of reproach and scorn to those who knew him less intimately.

To us, alienated even more, perhaps, by the lapse of half a century than by the breadth of sea that divides us, the eccentric figure of Thoreau seems to stand too far aloof from our own sphere of work and thought to attract us or even interest us. Yet it has a significance beyond itself: its eccentricity is more than whim, and it was both more natural and more needful in its own time and place than it would be in ours. We know little of the conventionality and insincerity that warped much of the life and literature of the eighteenth century, and we seldom realise the reaction that began with the nineteenth. The movement toward freedom, naturalness, and intellectual self-reliance led by Goethe and Wordsworth in literature was only one phase of a wider tendency working more slowly in social life—still more slowly in religion—but so effectively that we who are born to enjoy the results take them as matter of course.

We deem it more noble to think for ourselves than to think as other people do: we honour sincerity more than conventionality, and faith more than form. But it was not so in Thoreau's time. "Authority," said Theodore Parker in those days, "is taken for Truth, and not Truth for Authority." To be orthodox was more than to be true. There was nothing to foster individuality—everything to repress it. Society had grown materialistic, mechanical, selfish; it seemed to have roofed itself in so comfortably in this world, that it could no longer feel the breeze from beyond, nor see the sky. In such an atmosphere, Thoreau could not breathe: and he pitied those who could. "It is better," he said, "to have your head in the clouds and know where you are—if, indeed, you cannot get it above them—than to breathe the clearer atmosphere below them, and think that you are in Paradise." Society seemed to him over-civilised: in the business of maintaining life in due form and elegance, there was danger of forgetting the real meaning and moment of living at all. He, then, would live simply, deliberately; would front only the essential facts of life, and learn their meaning. "I did not wish to take a cabin passage, but rather to go before the mast and on the deck of the world." "In an age of increasing artificiality and restless self-indulgence," writes Mr. Salt, "he preached a gospel of healthfulness, simplicity, and contentment—the gospel of natural living, of the open air. He taught men to trust their real, native instincts, and to distrust the innumerable artificial wants with which custom and tradition have everywhere surrounded us: to distinguish between genuine taste and acquired habit. As the Greek philosopher exclaimed, 'How many things there are that I do not desire!'—so Thoreau insisted that 'a man is rich in proportion to the number of things he can afford to let alone.'"

Now, many of us think that those who want little get little from life, and we have more sympathy with the yearnings of a hungry soul than with the contentment of the satisfied. And Thoreau has won more scorn than respect by his abstinence from all that to most men makes life worth living. "He was bred to no profession," Emerson tells us: "he never married: he lived alone, he never went to church: he never voted: he refused to pay a tax to the State: he ate no flesh, he drank no wine, he never knew the use of tobacco, and, though a naturalist, he used neither trap nor gun."

"So many negative superiorities," observes Robert Louis Stevenson, "begin to smack a little of the prig." It is perhaps this suspicion of priggishness that embitters the criticism of such men as Lowell and Stevenson. And it may be a very natural misconception, but a misconception none the less. It is perhaps impossible to criticise fairly a character with which one's own has not a certain degree of affinity, and Thoreau's spiritual kindred are few. To the rest, his virtues are fads, and his insistence on them, egoism. But there is a wonderful difference of opinion among Thoreau's critics: if to some he seem a prig, to others he is a prophet. By all he is acknowledged to be a man—and there are not many such—who was what he professed to be, and practised what he preached, a man as pure and true as Nature herself—"with whom to hold intercourse," said Hawthorne, "is like hearing the wind in the boughs of a forest-tree." And until we have done with all cant and hypocrisy and mercenary motives and sordid aims, the world cannot afford to lose sight of Thoreau.

Henry David Thoreau was born at Concord, Massachusetts, in July, 1817. His father's ancestry was French: his mother was the daughter of a Scotch minister. Their home was a picturesque farmhouse among the hills, a typical New England building, with its grey, weather-beaten boards, and grassy, unfenced door-yard. There was a stream in front, and broad meadows and orchards around it. For many years this homestead was the recognised resort of Abolitionist leaders, and the refuge of fugitive slaves. For all the Thoreaus, and especially the mother, were very earnest in the cause of freedom. It is said that "the atmosphere of earnest purpose which pervaded the great movement for the emancipation of the slaves gave to the Thoreau family an elevation of character which was ever after perceptible," so that the household seemed to possess a distinct and marked individuality of its own. As a child, Henry used to drive his mother's cows down to the Concord pastures, where the classic Musketaquid "slumbers between broad prairies, kissing the long meadow-grass, and bathes the overhanging boughs of elder-bushes and willows, or the roots of elms and ash-trees and clumps of maple." The boy was educated at the village schools, and at the age of sixteen went to Harvard. But he was not happy there: he yearned for his familiar woods and streams, and hated to be pent indoors—even though the doors were those of Harvard. He became an excellent Greek scholar, but did not otherwise distinguish himself, and probably gained more from his private reading than from the prescribed course of study. He read eagerly, not only the best English, but the classics, and ancient books of the East—those Scriptures of India and Persia and China from which he so often quotes. After four years at College, he took his degree, and went back to Concord. That was an eventful year for Thoreau, for it brought him the friendship of Emerson, who had just made his home at Concord, and of the naturalist Agassiz, for whom he collected fishes and turtles. In this year, too, he made his first appearance in public as a lecturer at the Concord Lyceum. He was now twenty, and had "finished his education," as it is called; but he had neither a profession, nor money, nor any visible means of support. But this did not trouble him in the least. He could do almost anything he tried—could give a lecture, or build a boat, or whitewash a wall, and was often employed by owners of land in the neighbourhood as surveyor, for which his accurate knowledge of the country especially qualified him. When sufficiently industrious, he also worked at his father's craft of pencil-making. At this he was an adept.

Replying to a circular sent out from Harvard to get information about the career of former students, Thoreau wrote:—

I don't know whether mine is a profession, or a trade, or what not. It is not yet learned, and in every instance has been practised before being studied. . . . I am a schoolmaster, a private tutor, a surveyor, a gardener, a farmer, a painter (I mean a house-painter), a carpenter, a mason, a day-labourer, a pencil-maker, a writer, and sometimes a poetaster. My present employment is to answer such orders as may be expected from so general an advertisement as the above. That is, if I see fit, which is not always the case, for I have found out a way to live without what is commonly called employment or industry, attractive or otherwise.

Many hours of every day were spent in the woods and on the hills about Concord—sometimes with a companion, oftener alone. He found this necessary for his mental and physical health, and when he reflects on the endurance of his fellow-men—still more of women—who can sit indoors all day, heedless of sunrise and sunset, of breeze and rain, he thinks some credit due to them for not having all committed suicide long ago. Walking has for him, he assures us, "nothing in it akin to taking exercise, as the sick take medicine, at certain hours, but is itself the enterprise and adventure of the day." Indoors he cannot live truly.

Alone in distant fields and woods (he writes one winter day), even in a bleak day like this, I come to myself, I once more feel myself grandly related. This cold and solitude are friends of mine. I suppose that this value in my case is equivalent to what others get by church-going and prayer. . . . I wish to forget, a considerable part of each day, all mean, narrow, trivial men, and therefore I come out to these solitudes, where the problem of existence is simplified. . . . I enter some glade in the woods, perchance, where a few weeds and dry leaves alone lift themselves above the snow, and it is as if I had come to an open window. I see out and around myself. . . . It is as if I always met in those places some grand, serene, immortal, infinitely encouraging, though invisible companion, and walked with him. . . . I am aware that most of my neighbours would think it a hardship to be compelled to linger here one hour, especially this bleak day, and yet I receive this sweet and ineffable compensation for it. It is the most agreeable thing I do.

For eight years he lived thus, usually at his father's house, sometimes an inmate of Emerson's, sometimes wandering about the country on foot, to the sea-shore, or the Indian camp, or the forest. And all that he did and saw, and thought, on these rambles, near and far, he recorded daily in his Journal—of which he left some 30 volumes—a medley of field science, and philosophy, and poetry, of humour, and satire, and shrewd wisdom. From this store he would afterwards select the material of his lectures and essays.

And now his craving for Nature, for freedom, for a wild and simple life, led to the adventure by which he has become best known, and of which he tells in Walden.

One morning in March, 1845, when the ice on Walden pond was beginning to yield to the sunshine, and all the wild life of the forest was waking from its winter sleep, Thoreau borrowed an axe from a neighbour, and went down to the shore of the lake. Here he set to work among the young pines, and day by day came felling and hewing timber, shaping posts and rafters, and framing them together at length into a neat little hut. It was a work of several months, for the builder could never bring himself to devote a whole day, or even eight hours of one, to labour. But by July it was habitable, and Thoreau went into residence, fitly enough, on Independence Day. And never was prince so proud of his palace as our scholar-gipsy of his log-hut! "There is some of the same fitness," he said, "in a man's building his own house that there is in a bird's building his own nest. Who knows but if men constructed their dwellings with their own hands, and provided food for themselves and families simply and honestly enough, the poetic faculty would be universally developed, as birds universally sing when they are so engaged?"

It was not at first provided with a chimney or plastered, "the walls being of rough, weather-stained boards, with wide chinks, which made it cool at night." "I did not need to go out doors to take the air, for the atmosphere within had lost none of its freshness." As winter approached, he found he could do with less ventilation, and added a ceiling and chimney. For food, he baked his own bread, and ate such vegetables as his little garden yielded, and the wild fruits of the forest. He drank only the clear water of the lake. He did not seem to need so much food as most men, and always regarded it as one of the follies of civilised life that men should work so hard to provide themselves with a quantity and variety of food that only the hard work itself made necessary. When he had been two or three months in the woods, the wild birds would come and perch on his shoulder, and sometimes on his spade when he was digging. He had a strange charm for animals: a wild squirrel once clung to him, nestling in his coat and refusing to be driven away. Birds built their nests in his house, and fish would come to his hand if he did but dip it in the water as his boat floated on the lake. It seemed like Nature's response to his affection.

He declared that by working for about six weeks at any of his various crafts, he earned enough for a year's livelihood—why should he do more? He did not care for wealth, or luxury, or social position, and no life but his own depended on his labour.

Money might be of great service to me (he once said), but the difficulty now is that I do not improve my opportunities, and therefore I am not prepared to have my opportunities increased. . . .

There were times when I could not afford to sacrifice the bloom of the present moment to any work, whether of the head or the hands. I love a broad margin to my life. Sometimes in a summer morning, having taken my accustomed bath, I sat in my sunny doorway from sunrise till noon, rapt in reverie, amidst the pines and hickories and sumachs, in undisturbed solitude and stillness, while the birds sang around or flitted noiseless through the house until, by the sun falling in at my west window, or the noise of some traveller's waggon on the distant highway, I was reminded of the lapse of time. I grew in those seasons like corn in the night, and they were far better than any work of the hands would have been.

Visitors—friends, rather—were always welcome—for Thoreau was no misanthrope—though inquisitive strangers found him sometimes cold and inhospitable. The hut contained but three chairs, "one for solitude, two for friendship, and three for society" as the owner explains, and if more than two guests came together they were usually entertained under the pines. Thoreau's friends did not come to eat and drink—there was no sumptuous fare in Walden—but how delightful must have been the intercourse of such men as Emerson, and Hawthorne, and Channing, as they wandered with Thoreau by the lake, or talked together under the trees! "It was a pleasure and a privilege to walk with him," Emerson writes, "He knew the country like a fox or a bird, and passed through it freely by paths of his own. Under his arm he carried an old music-book to press plants: in his pocket his diary and pencil, a spy-glass for birds, microscope, jack-knife, and twine. . . . He drew out of his breast pocket a diary, and read the names of all the plants that should bloom that day, whereof he kept account, as a banker does when his notes fall due. He thought that if waked up from a trance in this swamp, he could tell by the plants what time of the year it was within two days."

After rather more than two years of forest life, Thoreau returned to his home-life at the farm, not because he was tired of his sylvan solitude, but because he felt that he had learnt what he went to learn, and had no motive for prolonging his experiment.

Perhaps it seemed to me that I had several more lives to live, and could not spare any more time for that one. . . . I learned this, at least, by my experiment: that if one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavours to live the life that he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours. He will put some things behind, will pass an invisible boundary—new, universal, and more liberal laws will begin to establish themselves around and within him, or the old laws be expanded and interpreted in his favour in a more liberal sense. . . . In proportion as he simplifies his life, the laws of the universe will appear less complex, and solitude will not be solitude, nor poverty poverty, nor weakness weakness. If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost—that is where they should be. Now, put the foundations under them.

Soon after his return his father died, and for the maintenance of his mother and sisters he took on his father's trade of pencil-making—not grudgingly, as obeying an unwelcome call of duty, but without more ado than he would make over a turn in his woodland path. Thenceforward he lived for home, content with the love and companionship that had been his from childhood. Fretted by no excessive toil, fevered by no ambition, his calm pure soul breathed around it the sunshine of a June morning, the serenity of his own Walden lake.

Fifteen years passed thus—uneventful, untroubled. Then one cold November day, in 1861, Thoreau took his usual walk through the forest. The snow was lying, and the wind blew chill, but he was heedless, and, lingering to count the rings in a felled tree, took cold. He had always been frail, and probably only his frugal, healthy habits had prolonged his life for him. All through the winter months he lay ill, looking forward to a spring whose flowers were not again to brighten his forest path, but to bloom over his grave. Yet he was not unhappy. A month before his death he wrote to a friend, or rather dictated, being too ill to write, "You ask particularly after my health. I suppose that I have not many months to live; but, of course, I know nothing about it. I may add that I am enjoying existence as much as ever, and regret nothing." What should he regret? He had found it good to live, but he felt that the best was yet to be, and he trusted that when, as he said, he had thrown some of his cargo overboard, he would only make the better speed toward that far ideal whose gleam he followed.

Besides, even here, he seemed almost to live in both worlds. To him, "Our thoughts are the epochs in our lives; all else is but as a journal of the winds that blew while we were here. . . . They are visionary and insignificant—all that we commonly call life and death, and affect me less than my dreams."

THE MORAL ASPECT OF HEREDITY.

III.—VICE AN EDUCATOR.

THERE are few of us so callous but that we are moved to pity by the sight of physical blindness; yet how far more terrible an evil is moral blindness, for those who have eyes to see! Through what awful experiences must a soul so afflicted grope its way into the light! There is the blindness of the soul in which a moral sense seems never to have awakened, and there is that far more appalling spectacle—the darkness of a soul in which the conscience has been seared and deadened. “The resuscitating of a soul that has gone to asphyxia is no momentary or pleasant process, but a long and terrible one.” (Carlyle.)

Yet—strange as it may seem—is it not a fact that the loathsome thing we call vice has often been made the instrument by which souls have been restored to light? Are not the blackest pages in history the forerunners of great moral and spiritual revivals? But for the corruption of the Jewish Sanhedrim, and that fiendish, howling mob of nineteen centuries ago, Christianity had never been the force that it is to-day: the unspeakable infamies of the Romish Church had to precede the Reformation: it was the perfidy of the Florentines that gave to Savonarola's saintly life its crowning glory of martyrdom. What is true of the race is true of the individual; we are each of us a miniature of the whole race. As the dark background of cruelty, treachery, and superstition has been made to throw into high relief the shining figures of Earth's saints and heroes, so in the individual that which is basest serves to develop and intensify his nobler aspirations.

The penalty of sin is degradation. It has been decreed that a man shall not continue to disobey the dictates of his conscience and still retain a high standard of character. It matters nothing whether the fault appear glaring or trifling, for it is not the outward act which degrades the soul, but the inward act of self-will in choosing the lower before the higher. Hence it is that the man of blunter moral sense may indulge, without endangering his soul, in pursuits which to the more enlightened conscience would bring moral deterioration. The sinfulness of an act is in proportion to the moral sensibilities of the individual; a thing is wrong in so far as there has been revealed to the soul the knowledge of something better. Therefore we often see how when a man gifted with spiritual insight allows himself to disregard his conscience, he loses that divinest gift of our nature—his freewill, and becomes the slave of some tormenting vice. Vice is the appointed penalty of sin—a terrible penalty, but imposed not as we in our blind human fashion inflict penalties; in a spirit of vindictiveness or harsh, retributive justice, but in truest beneficence. God's penalties are all remedial. Punishment inevitably follows disobedience; but punishment in its highest sense means purifying, and to say we cannot escape the consequence or punishment of our sins is only to say that we cannot escape the purifying process. The soul that is bent on self-destruction is held back and arrested, though it may be by terrible means—sickness, calamity, anguish of mind, these are “God's angels” standing with fiery swords to bar the forbidden path.

The consequences of sin, like all natural consequences, are permitted in order that we may escape “the greater evil.” The greater evil would be to continue in disobedience—to prevent this Providence deprives the individual of his freewill, and leaves him for the time the slave of his own diseased mind. It is when a man awakes to find himself in the grip of some lower passion that he is roused to make resistance—to struggle to regain his freedom: it is then he begins to fight for his soul. This disease of the mind which we call vice, may it not be as purifying in its ultimate effect upon character as is physical pain? “All God's angels come to us disguised,” and may not this law of Heredity, even where it seems most to work for destruction, be but another of His agencies for the awakening of conscience and the creating of spiritual discernment?

There have been pure and noble souls to whom the sight of human suffering was so inexplicable that they refused to worship a Creator who had so planned His world; but we in these days have grown to see how the sweetest attributes of our nature have come through pain. It is obvious that had the physical frame been so organised as to be impervious to disease, the race could never have attained to the same degree of moral excellence.

A recent explorer, in recounting his perilous experiences, attributes his intrepidity in danger and his contempt for pain, to his perfect physical development. He holds the theory that fear is impossible to the man in sound bodily health. Yet is there not something higher than that mere animal courage? It is through the weakness of the flesh that character is perfected. The little child who trembles to be left alone in the darkness, whose sensitive nerves vibrate to the conjurings of his excited imagination, and yet who with his small strength struggles to subdue his terror, has in him the germ of a finer heroism than comes of a rightly adjusted frame.

It has lately been stated by an eminent medical authority, that now in all probability the minimum of disease has been reached. Improved sanitation and the immense strides which medical science has made during the last fifty years, have checked the tide of those epidemics which in days gone by used from time to time to ravage our towns; but with increasing civilisation new disorders, new complications are continually arising more subtle and more difficult to cope with. We are not yet within sight of the end of the struggle, nor could we afford to be free of it, for each new form of disease is a further means of education, calling forth higher exhibitions of sympathy, fortitude, and moral strength. Pain is the great elevator; without it the race would drift back into mere animalism. Is it not by Divine ordination that while we are straining after higher civilisation we are involuntarily creating fresh dangers for posterity? The higher the organism the more liable is it to disorder: thus the conflict with disease is perpetuated. And does not this same law govern our spiritual advancement? As pain and disease are the result of the transgression of physical laws, so vice is the consequence of the transgression of moral laws, and as in the one case the penalties suffered become an elevating power, so in the other may not the penalties attached be made to minister to highest ends?

Physical disease, however loathsome in its nature, appeals to our sense of pity, and ought not moral disease to call forth the same compassion? Even though the victim may have forged his own chains, he has yet a claim upon our sympathies. For so subtle is the communication between mind and matter, so inseparable the thought from the brain, the emotions from the thrilling of a nerve, that it is impossible to measure precisely to what extent our tastes and tendencies are determined by the physical frame we inherit. It is at least undeniable that certain bodily conditions predispose the frame to certain vices. Is not self-control rendered difficult to many through some weakness of nerve or tissue? Does not a vivid imagination encounter a thousand temptations which to the unimaginative could never present themselves? Does not much of the moralist's superiority lie in his immunity from danger, his evenly balanced frame, or may be his dulness of perception, rendering him proof against many of those temptations which so powerfully assail another class of temperament? One man inherits tastes which he may freely encourage without being accounted vicious; another inherits tastes which if indulged will inevitably lead him into vice. To such a one life means a continual struggle. It is a difficult matter to uproot an inherited instinct, which is, as it were, part of our very being. A man's hereditary tendency is his continual temptation, and ever the strongest when he is least able to resist it. It is through this conflict of higher aspiration and lower tendency that character is evolved. Instincts, whether good or bad, are not character. For that which is inherent we merit neither censure nor approval. Salvation is not won by instinct, but by effort. If we would enter in at the Strait Gate we must strive. Yet how often they who have striven hardest are, in human judgment, accounted failures! Take, for instance, the case of a man in whose veins runs the fiery craving for alcohol. Again and again he resists the inclination, yet it still remains: he cannot free himself from it. It is not a foe that can be dealt with and settled outright, but a demon that rises afresh after each repulsion; and because in such cases the conflict involves not only a moral but a physical strain, the battle is often an unequal one, and the losing of it a foregone conclusion. Then it is that the moral bully steps in and says to such a one: “You have bartered your soul—you have sold your manhood.” It is strange with what unruffled equanimity some theologians regard the fate of these “degenerates”; they are content with their theory of “judgment according to type,” and cheerfully consign the vanquished soul to “his own place.” And yet, had that same soul been incarnated in an untainted bodily frame, how different, to human eyes, would have been its destiny—honour instead of dishonour, prosperity in place of defeat. Are we, then, to believe that such a soul is to be damned for evermore because of an inherited taste? Theologians are pleased to inform us that the old theory of Hell is exploded, and they offer us as a substitute their new idea of “judgment according to type.” Better far the old Hell of fire and brimstone than this new Hell of Evil—this awful picture of a place where degraded and inhuman ruffians are herded together, being unfit for any other society than their own.

In the experience of any man who has succumbed to some hereditary moral weakness, there has almost invariably been a time when he has striven against it, when he has fought passionately to free himself from his besetting sin. Such struggles are known only to the eye of Heaven; they belong to that veiled inner life which lies "upon the other side of silence." Is it, then, for nothing he has wrestled with his evil tendencies? Is the end to be only failure and despair?

Happily there is the more hopeful side which theologians are apt to overlook. Vice, after all, is but a disease—terrible and appalling—yet still a disease which shall die with the decay of the body. When physical conditions fall away, and the will is no longer the slave of a distorted imagination, the soul shall once again emerge into freedom—to how many shall death come as an angel of deliverance, freeing them from the tyranny of some hated bondage!

Vice is a stage in the development of human nature: an experience whereby the souls of men gain spiritual insight: it is the tree of knowledge of good and evil, revealing to our vision the beauty of holiness and the hideousness of sin. Says Dr. Arnold, of Rugby: "In a deep sense of moral evil, more perhaps than in anything else, abides a saving knowledge of God. It is not so much to admire moral good; that we may do, and yet not be ourselves conformed to it; but if we really do abhor that which is evil, not the persons in whom evil resides, but the evil which dwelleth in them, and much more manifestly and certainly to our own knowledge in our own hearts—this is to have the feeling of God and of Christ, and to have our spirit in sympathy with the spirit of God." Do we not often find a more passionate longing for purity in the soul that has known the touch of evil than in the heart of many a complacent saint?

This much we must believe if we are to have faith in the ultimate triumph of Right: that the man, who, either through his own sins or the sins of his fathers, becomes the slave of some evil habit, falls under just those conditions necessary to his spiritual welfare. Degeneration is but a change of condition—the preliminary stage of some new development. We are fenced about by a network of laws framed to meet every exigency of human need. In this God's Universe whatever happens is always the best that can happen; whatever terrible penalties we through our own wilfulness incur will be the best that can possibly come to us. In the evolution of the race a backward step is impossible; what appears to be downward and reactionary is but as the autumn decay which must precede the fuller life of the spring, or as the dark hours of midnight which herald the coming of a brighter dawn.

There is no suffering of mind or body but shall one day have its equivalent in moral gain. And shall the efforts of the soul foredoomed to failure meet with no recompense? There is no waste in Nature; still less shall there be waste in the higher realm of the Spiritual. A man shall ultimately be that which he desires to be. The conflict is for us: the issue lies in other hands. Apparent defeat may not be real: failure sometimes covers more effort than success. The victory goes to the strong; for the weak there is reproach, remorse, an agony of despair. And, yet is not each soul working out its own appointed destiny—reaching out to that which has alone been made possible for it? Shall not its darkest experiences prove part of its redemption—is not its very suffering a sure guarantee of future blessedness?

"With aching hands and bleeding feet
We dig and heap, lay stone on stone;
We bear the burden and the heat
Of the long day, and wish 'twere done.
Not till the hours of light return,
All we have built do we discern."

OBITUARY.

MR. BENJAMIN HEAPE, J.P.

It is with sincere regret that we announce the death, on the 16th inst., of this estimable man and earnest friend of educational and religious institutions. The churches in and about Manchester have lost in him a wise and generous benefactor; and our colleges are greatly indebted to his liberality and personal devotion. A long life, of eighty-two years, so replete with beneficence, calls for more than a brief note, and we hope next week to publish an adequate memoir. We shall only add now the grateful reminder that, while he was firmly attached to the main principles of Unitarianism, his sympathies were extended to every wise effort for the promotion of philanthropy and religion, irrespective of creed or party. intercourse with him was rendered singularly attractive through the refined courtesy of his manner, and the memory of his life, so rich in good works, remains as a stimulus and benediction.

AN ANCIENT LETTER.

There is an ancient letter, and its tenor runneth thus:—

PAUL to PHILEMON, our belov'd, who work'd and pray'd with us,—
To thee and thine from me and mine, here faithful at my side,
Greeting I send, and peace from God, in bondage though I bide.

Ever in prayer remembered, thy name is dear to me,
For all thy faith and all thy love to the saints I never see;
I pray that every good in thee may unto Christ abound,
And comfort me in comforting the hearts of all around.

To thee I might in boldness write, but now I only plead,
I falter out weak, ling'ring words, as for a boon indeed;
I might be bold for I am old,—I wear, besides, a chain

Which, if my feeble words might fail, should never plead in vain.

Blest is the Church within thy house, blest as the Church above,
Where each to each is captive and the only chain is love;
And think, oh! think, my comrade true, how sweet it is to see,
To hear the little children as they climb upon thy knee.

I have a son—Onesimus—the only child of mine,
Begotten in my bonds to show the tenderness divine;
To me a "helpful" son is he, though erst no "help" to thee;—
Fain would I keep him,—but I send him wistfully from me.

Is it to be in Christ, brother, and not like him forgive?
To crucify ourselves with him, but let our anger live?
Here is thy slave, Philemon, if thou seest as others see;
But, if thou art Philemon, 'tis my heart I send to thee.

Didst miss him,—angering, miss him?
But the bitterness is o'er,
For, parted for a season, he is thine for evermore.
And is it true he wrong'd thee, and robb'd thee of thine own?
Well, I will pay thee, brother,—I, old as I am, and lone.

Yea, I did pay thee, long ago, far more than worldly pelf,
And unto me thou owest yet that dearer thing, thyself.
I might be bold to speak in Christ, but once again I plead,— Receive him freely for love's sake, and give me joy indeed.

Ah, thou wilt smile,—I know thee well,—half-vex'd I should appear
To doubt, as doubt I never did, a heart so true and dear.
Dear heart, how should I doubt it? And if I give it pain,
There shall be joy exceeding when—I come to thee again!

For in thy constant love and care a sign to me is given
Of Love eternal and divine that cares for me in heaven;
Beseech that Love for me, brother, as I beseech of thee,
And shape my wonted lodging 'gainst the time I shall be free.

My lov'd ones love thee, and to thee a loving word they send,
Committing thee in friendship to the everlasting Friend,
Who died for us, and in our love receiveth his reward;
So with thy spirit be the grace of Jesus Christ, our Lord.

*So runs the ancient letter, and within its pages yet
There breathes a fresh and sweet perfume as of a violet;
It is the fragrance of a flower that every true heart knows,
And blessed is the garden where that flower for ever grows.*

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the "Imitation of Christ."

We should not give ear to every word or impulse, but warily and leisurely ponder things according to God. But, alas, we often believe and speak evil of others rather than good; so weak we are. But the perfect man does not lightly give credit to every speaker; for he knows that human frailty is prone to evil and very apt to slip in words.

It is great wisdom, not to be headlong in thy affairs, nor to stand stiffly in thine own conceits. As also not to believe everything which thou hearest, nor presently to pour into the ears of others what thou hast heard or dost believe.

Take counsel with a wise and conscientious man; and seek to be instructed by a better than thyself, rather than to follow thine own inventions. A good life makes a man wise according to God, and expert in many things. The more humble a man is in himself and the more subject unto God, the wiser and quieter shall he be in all his affairs.

Truth is to be sought for in Holy Scripture, not eloquence. All Holy Scripture is to be read in the same spirit wherewith it was written. We should search for profit in the Scriptures rather than subtlety of speech.

We ought as willingly to read devout and simple books as deep and profound. Let not the authority of the writer move thee, whether he be of small or great learning, but let the love of pure truth draw thee to read. Search not who said this, but mark what is said. Men pass, but the truth of the Lord abideth for ever. God speaks to us in sundry ways, without respect of persons.

Be not ashamed to serve others for the love of Jesus Christ, nor to seem poor in this world. Stand not upon thyself, but place thy hope in God. Do what lieth in thy power, and God will help thy good will. Trust not in thine own knowledge, nor in the cunning of any living man, but rather in the grace of God, who helpeth the humble and humbleth the presumptuous. Glory not in wealth if thou have it, nor in friends because powerful, but in God who gives all things, and above all desires to give thee Himself.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"It is not growing like a tree,
In bulk, doth make men better be;
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year;
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and seer."

This column for the children is about growing. All boys and girls know a great deal about that matter. When a birthday comes how many of the young ones are measured on the nursery or the school-room wall to see how much taller they are than they were last year! While we are young we often have the words said to us, "How fast you grow!" and we get used to finding every year that we are broader, and taller, and stronger, and can run faster, and lift heavier weights than we could twelve months ago. But it is not this kind of growing that you are going to hear about to-day.

In the reign of King James I., Ben Jonson was Poet Laureat of England, as Tennyson used to be till he died; and it was Ben Jonson who wrote the four lines that stand at the head of this column. He wanted to tell people, living in those far off days, something about the most important kind of growing for men, women, and children. You see, he says, that it is not growing tall and strong, like a tree in its branches and trunk, that really matters most to men, nor is it really important whether we live a great many years, for he goes on in the same little poem to say—

"In short measures life may perfect be."

More than one hundred years after Ben Jonson's time there was a poor boy living in the old town of Dantzic, on the shore of the Baltic Sea. He was an errand boy who carried out wigs to his master's customers (for they used to wear wigs and dress very strangely in Dantzic in those days), and this poor errand boy put the same kind of thought into different words. He said, "Next year I shall be thirteen, and every year I am a head bigger, and everyone who sees me says, 'How tall you grow!' But if I said I was glad to hear it, it would not be true, 'for I think there is many a fellow who is an ass, and what is the use of my being tall if I can't study?'"

Well, this boy resolved he would grow in mind as well as body, and he used all his chances in life to read, and think, and become wise; and the end was, as he was loving-hearted, he became not only a scholar and a poet, but one of the great helpers of the world. If you had lived in Dantzic then you might have seen him buying books at an old bookstall with the pennies he had saved, and reading them in the odd times which he could spend as he liked. Some kind friends sent him to the high school, and how he did work, and at last he found himself at the head of the school. Then new chances opened out before him and he used them all. His name was John Falk. When he became a man he set on foot in Germany homes for friendless children whom the war had made orphans, and saved thousands of them from sin and want. This boy found out, you see, what kind of growth was really worth having.

Now comes a fable for you to read, about a "talking oak," which tells us the same kind of thing about growing. I used to read this fable when I was a child. I do not know where I found it, but I can remember it to tell it to you.

One day a boy stood under a huge oak tree that spread out its branches on every side, and he said, "What a grand tree! You are so brave and big." The oak found a voice and answered, "Once I was a little acorn, but I knew there was something in me which might shoot up into a great tree. So I shot forth my roots, little at first, in the soft, moist earth, and lifted my tender head, and something seemed to say to me, 'Why was this strength given to you except to put it forth and try to grow?' So I grew up," said the oak, "and became as tall and strong as you see me."

But as the boy looked round him in the forest he saw other trees that were bent and misshapen, and he asked the oak, "How is it that you stand up straight, and are not crooked and one-sided like some of these trees round you?" Then the oak replied, "When I was about to send out a new shoot I sometimes felt it would be nice to send it out on the warm south side, but something within me said 'No!' and while the voice was speaking I could not fear the cold north side, so I grew up in fair proportions as my Maker meant me to grow."

Then the boy thought, "If I were a tree I would grow straight and tall and put out my branches as I was meant to grow." He never remembered that every time he was selfish, or angry, or lazy, or mean, he was growing wrongly, as if, like a tree, he was putting forth his shoots on the wrong side.

And while he was thinking thus, the wise old oak rustled its leaves and spoke once more: "Boy, you have a soul within you which will make you something more beautiful than all the oaks in the forest, if you will obey it. You have an inward voice. Listen to it, and your soul will grow in good shape and you will learn to live rightly, and stand firm and strong in all the storms of life."

The boy's heart grew strong within him as he listened to the oak. He thought he would never again be afraid to speak the truth and would always listen to the inward voice and grow up brave and beautiful within.

So ends the fable of the "talking oak." It reminds us that our bodies are not our real selves. It is the spirit in each of us which loves and thinks and wills which is our real self, and we have to think how this self within us is growing. We all know what a great soul sometimes lives in a deformed, weak body. We can only see the poor little house of a body the spirit lives in, but his words and deeds tell us how beautiful the real self within it is. These real selves of ours are always growing, they never stand still. Every day we grow a little worse or a little better. Which way we grow depends so much on our wills and our habits. How quickly we make our habits! Every time we say "only this once!" and do a little wrong thing or say a little unkind word, we make it easier to do wrong next time. We are then putting out shoots on the wrong side, and growing crooked and misshapen. God has given us each a will within us. If we would grow rightly we must take care that these wills of ours grow strong and eager to do only what is right, and to love only what is beautiful and good. I once knew a boy who asked himself each night "Have I done anything like Jesus Christ would have done if he were in my place?" You see this boy's will was set upon growing in the right way.

Remember the words of the oak in the fable: "You have a soul within you. You have an inward voice. Listen to it and your soul will grow in good shape and you will learn to live rightly and stand firm and strong in all the storms of life."

CLEAR thinking, brave speaking, eager seeking—these are good—but not the only good things. Tender memories, sacred associations, beautiful imaginations, generous companionships—these are good things too. When these are thoroughly mingled, when the present has absorbed the best of the past, when a glorious tradition has become nationalised by being interpreted by a free spirit, and when free reason has been humanised by the touch of a glorious tradition—then we have a church.—Samuel M. Crothers.

HARVESTS.

It may not be without peculiar suggestiveness to thoughtful persons that, at this season, when the war-cloud is hanging densely before us, and minds are agitated about the recent outrage on justice in France, many, if not most, Christian Churches in our land will be specially reminded of the harvest. At all times the lessons of the fields are apposite, from the time of the growing of the lily to that of the reaping of the sheaves. Trite as they seem to be, there are few of us, if any, who can claim to know them so as to live by them without lapsing into the ways of ignorance, more or less defiant. When the spring blossoms appear, safely tended though so frail, and beautifully tinted though so soon to die, they find us still in need of their reminder that a like Providence is really over and about us also, if we would but trust it. And now when the corn and fruit are gathered in, and our places of worship are made eloquent with the witnesses of creative bounty and solemn with the testimony that sowing and reaping are divinely and indissolubly linked together, the festival finds us sadly in need of all their instruction, alike in comfort and in rebuke. It is for these voices of the Spirit that the devout mind will listen, amidst all that music and wisest speech can offer. Without them the decorations and the anthems are surely a "vain show." There is no epithet which we hear more frequently at this time than that which describes the ETERNAL ONE as "Lord of the harvest." Unless we are pagans and blind of heart, we must see that not in the produce of grain alone, or the yield of fruit, but in all results He is concerned. We sow: from Him is the increase. The bitter herb yields fruit after its kind, as truly as the wholesome wheat. "What will the harvest be?" is a question which comes home to us all, whether the field before us is that of politics, or social endeavour, or personal concerns. There is, somehow, a potency about us, name it as we will, that guards each germinal atom and brings it to its appointed fruition. This potency, which devout hearts call God, cannot be hoodwinked, cannot be cajoled. If the lie is sown it springs up in corruption and produces shame. If it is a lie guaranteed by the most trusted, most honoured in the land, none the less it goes on mathematically to exposure. If an injustice is done, it violates the integrity of things; and this universe is so made that such violation is shown at last in all its folly no less than in its impiety. Hence they are strong who refuse to sow injustice and gloss it with the fine name of imperialism; who believe in the might of reason and truth, whatever forces are for the moment arrayed against them. Beautiful, solemn are the lessons of harvest to the humble man of heart; terrible to the false, the tyrant, the trickster, the cunning and the greedy; inspiring with an angel's strength to him who enlists in the army that fights for the Kingdom of righteousness, peace, and brotherhood.

THE TRANSVAAL QUARREL.*

BY REV. E. A. ARMSTRONG.

FOR many generations back Dutchmen and Englishmen together have been slowly colonising those vast tracts which stretch from the Cape of Good Hope towards the centre of that vast dark continent which lies between the Atlantic and the Indian Oceans. There have been others also. But the main work of colonisation has been done by the plodding, steady industry of these two kindred peoples—the peoples who have been in European History the great bulwark against the ever threatening dominance of political and spiritual oppression. Side by side they have pushed over the dry and sandy soil, quarrelling sometimes, but, on the whole, good friends and neighbours, intermarrying frequently, so that now there is a large population which is as much English as Dutch, as much Dutch as English. There were times when these pastoral folk, having their own manner of living, their own notions and ways, their own virtues and their own faults, resented the regulations that came to them from London, and would inspan their oxen and trek hundreds of miles to the north and the north-east, that they might be free to live their own life and carry on their own habits. And imperial England, so far from wishing to stretch out her hand over the unfruitful feldt, bid these folk go their way and manage their own affairs, for she had enough to do to attend to matters nearer home. And so there arose the flourishing Orange Free State, immediately north of our own colonies, and further north still, beyond the Vaal, the South African Republic, now under the presidency of Paul Kruger, who, nearly seventy years ago, as a very little boy, trekked with his parents to that far north country.

We had our troubles and disputes together, which could hardly fail to be. But within the last twenty years we solemnly and willingly agreed with the people of the Transvaal, that they should be a State internally independent, with whose domestic affairs we would in no way interfere, provided always that they should not make treaties with foreign powers, without the knowledge and sanction of England.

That is our solemn bond and promise, deliberately made, concerning which there is and can be no doubt or question, our solemn bond and promise, to go back from which—apart from all other considerations—is to forfeit our integrity, and to put ourselves outside the ranks of honourable peoples. We pledged ourselves fifteen years ago. It has been said of Englishmen that their word is as good as their bond. Are we to make our bond and our word alike, mere worthless instruments? Treaties are made that they may bind, not that they may be broken the moment they are inconvenient. The man who counsels England to make her own promise null, is guilty of high treason against the English commonwealth.

But, meanwhile, the goldfields in the centre of the Transvaal country had been discovered. The simple farmer who constituted the population knew nothing of economics and erected no safe-guards against the dangers that discovery involved. Foreigners of all descriptions rushed into the country—chiefly Englishmen—and got these gold-mines into their own hands, and worked them for their own profit. For the most part these men have never settled down in the country, but are and were birds of passage. They make their pile and then come home to spend it. Park-lane, London, is crowded with these sons of fortune. Those at present in the Transvaal are probably no better and no worse than goldminers and speculators elsewhere. But that is no very high certificate of character. They are men in a hurry to get rich, and impatient of the slow ways of ordinary industry. They are altogether out of sympathy with the quiet pastoral ways and old-fashioned Puritan ideas of the people in the midst of whom they have dumped themselves down, and no one can expect any very happy amalgamation between them. Moreover, most of them do not want to amalgamate, but only to fill their sacks with gold and then come home to spend it.

Now such a population as that is always very unsettling to any community. Happily in most instances in history these gold-diggers and the speculators who swarm about their rear have burst in upon states big and strong enough to absorb them or control them. Klondyke is no great danger to the great Western Republic. But if the United States consisted of only 30,000 farmers and their families, Klondyke would be an enormous danger to them, and the discovery of the gold-mines a national disaster. That is the condition of things in the Transvaal, and the Dutch farmers will do well to see to it that too much power be not absorbed by their gold-seeking visitors.

These visitors, however, have put in a claim to the full rights of citizenship, just as if they and their children meant to settle down in the Transvaal and help to build up its health and its wealth. The Transvaal has two chambers. The Uitlanders have all the while had a vote for the second chamber after two years' residence, and the right to sit in it after two years more—a much more sweeping privilege than any foreigner settling in England gets. But hitherto the Uitlander has not had a vote for the first chamber (the more important of the two) under fourteen years' residence. Let us remember that no foreigner and no Englishman either ever acquires a vote for our first chamber at all, though he have lived in the country five times fourteen years. However, the Transvaal Legislature has now passed an Act giving the Uitlander a vote for the first chamber after seven years' residence. At one moment President Kruger offered to make it five on certain conditions. We declined the conditions, and the offer fell through. But the seven years' franchise for the first chamber remains, with the two years' franchise for the second. In England a foreigner can seldom obtain a vote for the second chamber under six years' residence, and for the first no citizen ever obtains a vote at all.

Now the proposal is—and it finds very wide and enthusiastic favour—that we should send Englishmen to kill as many of the Boers as may be needful, unless they at once reduce the seven years' vote for the first chamber to five. A meeting was held in Manchester on Friday evening to question the propriety of this proposal, and hundreds of Englishmen howled at the principal speaker for half-an-hour before they would let him speak.

That is a very crude and naked way of putting it; but it is the precise and ungarnished truth. It is quite arguable, of course, that the Uitlander ought to have his double vote in five years, or four, or three. It is quite arguable too that he ought not to have it for seven years, or ten, or twelve. There is no absolute principle at stake. It is all a matter of opinion, of expediency, of arrangement; and one would suppose that the people with the first right to an opinion would be that people who are invited to give the franchise to their somewhat unwelcome visitors. We have often been a long time in England deciding whether certain classes ought or ought not to have the franchise at all; and we should certainly think it a little unreasonable if Germany threatened war unless we gave the German clerks in Water-street the British franchise two years sooner than we do.

However, this appears to be the highest resource of British statesmanship, clamorously backed by a great mass of the British people—that we should proceed to kill the Transvaal farmers if they do not give way at once—to shoot them with dum-dum bullets, to lay waste their fields, to destroy their food, to burn their homes, to leave their widows and children to starve, or perhaps—a kinder course—to shoot them too, to water their fields with blood, to cover the ground with a mash of scattered brains, in order that they may see that a five years' franchise alone is in the true order of the universe of God.

It is a crude way to put it. But I hate the word "war." It has a martial ring about it, suggests flaring of trumpets, and flying of banners, and national pride, and triumph, and glory, whereas it really means just those sickening and ghastly things to which I have barely dared allude. And we, a Christian people, save the mark! dare to put forward this device as the means of settling this petty quarrel between a seven years' and a five years' franchise.

And wicked as any war in a cause so trumpery would be, there are circumstances which would add tenfold to the wickedness of such a war as this and to the disasters that must flow from it. Side by side these two peoples—the foremost peoples for freedom in the history of the world—have built up that youthful and growing South African civilisation. Side by side English and Dutch have yoked the oxen, and ploughed the furrow, and taught the virgin soil to subserve the needs of man. They have lived together, traded together, toiled together, wedded together, spread over those broad provinces thousands of children who are blended of either blood. Side by side they have reclaimed the country from the savage hordes which roamed its sun-swept tablelands—with frequent cruelty and crime, it is to be feared, against those same savages, sins which they have shared as they have shared their virtues—but still on the whole making for a higher life, for a civilisation, a Christianity, blended Dutch and English, which should be for the good of mankind at large. And now by this war you will drive the wedge clean through this civilisation. You will split it in twain with a loud noise. You will set Englishman against Dutchman, Dutchman against Englishman. You will divide families asunder. You will drive thousands who have been loyal to you, and would still be loyal to you if you would let them, Dutchmen, under your rule in Cape Colony and Natal, into alienation and hostility, since they can no longer respect you or love you if they see you slaying their kin on the thin pretext of this childish quarrel. And the great edifice which has been reared slowly and painfully—the great edifice of this Teutonic South Africa—will be ruined and topple to its fall through the murderous vengeance of your state-craft.

And the black hordes that flank your Colonies, who outnumber you even in many of your settlements, if they see the white men divided, slashing at each other's breasts, how long will they refrain from rushing into the fray, and where will the slaughter and murder end?

So inconceivably petty is the alleged excuse for war compared to the colossal evil invoked, that it is absolutely impossible not to believe that there is something more behind. No great and responsible state ever yet went deliberately to war for a cause so ridiculously inadequate. And for that something behind we have not far to seek. Mr. Rhodes and the Chartered Company and the South African League openly treat all South Africa simply as their happy hunting ground. They have compassed round the Transvaal and the Orange Free State with their own lands, where under the British flag they subject the natives to that cruel form of slavery known as compulsory apprenticeship. They are drawing enormous wealth from their undertakings, and statesmen and noblemen of high degree are among their shareholders at home. But the gold-fields of the Rand lie in the heart of the territory of the Boers. These devotees of Mammon will know no rest till they have laid their hands upon those mines. War is their means to an end. By one false move they showed their hand in the Jamieson Raid. But the English people are swift to forget. Let them realise at least that behind the simple folk that are troubled at the grievances of the Uitlanders, behind the despatches of Colonial Secretaries, and the deliberations of Cabinets, is a persistent, relentless, wholly unscrupulous energy, pressing unceasingly for war, eager to entrap the Boers into any false move, swift to suggest the worst interpretation of their every word and act, ingenious with all the ingenuity of insatiable greed to inveigle the British public into the war-temper, and so to set the scene that an enterprise of plunder and of rapine shall seem to be a crusade of justice.

Only if this English people—salt of the earth, as it has been in many a great historic deed—have indeed lost its savour, will these brigands of the great world of politics, succeed in the stupendous crime to which they have set their hands.

THE TRANSVAAL QUESTION.

SIR,—The slanderous movement against the Transvaal on the part of truculent Englishmen, both in South Africa and in England—a movement apparently following from the miserable Raid, but far more elaborately plotted—appears to me to be leading to the grossest act of national burglary which a Christian people can commit. First, these bloodthirsty goldseekers bear false witness against their neighbours, then having worked up the Jingo Press to fever heat, they fly from the land where they have prospered so luxuriantly, and whining about their little grievances, force this country into a most horrible civil war, certain to result in long-continued hatred and the disunion of the two races. The English and Dutch have each a noble history, both have a long-tried love of freedom and independence, and the first business of a patriotic Press should be to increase the friendliness between them, which has already brought inestimable benefits to all South Africa.

R. RUSSELL.

Dunrozel, Haslemere, Surrey, Sept. 14.

SIR,—As a British citizen living in a country where everybody, chiefly from racial sympathies, favours the Boers, I have been brought to examine the question carefully for myself and have come to a very different conclusion.

1. I may say that I am not a Conservative, but an out-and-out Democrat. Still, as I am not a party man, and hate the party spirit, I endeavour to judge of each question on its own merits and on its connection with the general welfare of humanity, though the result may be siding pro tem. with a Conservative Government.

2. I have been for years a member of the Peace Society and am an ardent and militant anti-militarist. But my commonsense tells me—and unfortunately The Hague Conference has given fresh proof—that the abolition of war and the substitution of arbitration are still distant ideals; and in present emergencies it is not always possible to act up to future ideals, however strenuously we may strive for their realisation. We are, alas! often obliged to take into account actual facts and necessities.

Now it seems to me a fact that the great European nations are distinctly militarist and armed to the teeth; and, under such circumstances, it also seems to me a political necessity that England should show herself ready and willing to fight when she thinks herself in the right. It is not the love of peace and, righteousness, nor the desire for arbitration, nor the horror of bloodshed, that keeps the general-staffs of the European armies from war: they would like war. And it must be disagreeable for officers, high and low, not to have an opportunity of putting all their science and experiments and long practice to effective use. What restrains them is simply the fear of one another. And just now with all the numerous causes of international conflict, a nation that was not feared would be in serious jeopardy, and especially a nation like Great Britain with so many colonies and dependencies. In this state of things, the resolute attitude of the British Government in the Fashoda incident did England far more good than any appeal to arbitration. And for the same reasons I should dread any measure in the Transvaal question which might be construed into a sign of weakness. It is true the Transvaal is a small country; but on the Continent we have heard and read enough about the victories of the Boers in the past, about the fear the English have of the Boers, and the likelihood of the Boers again beating the English, to know what interpretation would be put upon an in extremis appeal to arbitration on the part of the British Government. It would be a moral defeat, a serious loss of moral authority, and a great temptation to future encroachments upon England's rights.

I still hope that war may be averted; but for the interests of Great Britain, and, I think, of civilisation, and of future peace, it must be averted by the submission of the Boers to England's righteous claims and by a cessation of that tortuous diplomacy which has constantly been withdrawing with one hand what it offered with the other.

3. Everybody seems to be agreed that the Uitlanders have very real and serious grievances; I need, therefore, only point out that these grievances have been openly admitted by such different French papers as the Siècle and the Figaro.

4. Still, it is said that the English Government has no right to force new citizens upon a country that does not want them. And it is asked what we should think of a foreign Government which presumed to dictate to our Government the conditions under which strangers were to be received into British citizenship.

But the cases are not at all parallel. The Transvaal is a new country, and in new countries it is the rule, and a very righteous rule—witness the United States of America even at this day—that foreigners should be admitted into citizenship upon prompt and easy terms. In the British possessions of South Africa, the Boers are placed upon an equal footing with the British. I say this is righteous. In a new colony, the land, which, after all, has been taken from the natives, cannot belong entirely to the first colonists, unless they are able to occupy it fully and use it all to the greater profit of mankind; for the earth belongs to man. The Boers have shown themselves incapable of properly working the land they have taken, and especially of bringing to light its mineral wealth; and when others come and do it for them, and thus obtain an evident claim upon the country, they say: We are the masters here. We will make the laws that suit us and you will have nothing to do with the government of the country; you will please to submit to whatever we, the minority, may decide. They say even: We will force you to defend against foreign attacks this country of which we will not allow you to become citizens. I say this is a criminal injustice which, as the majority of the victims of this injustice are British, justifies British interference—and an energetic interference, putting an end to patient but fruitless negotiations and breaking down all false pretences.

5. Some say that the Uitlanders are just gold-seekers or greedy capitalists and speculators, not worthy of all the trouble they are causing. My opinion is that mines ought always to be public and not private property. But perhaps that is another distant ideal. However, I do not see how it can be a despicable thing to extract gold, which in our present social organisation is an indispensable means of exchange; and it seems to me that if anybody may be accused of being covetous and grasping, it is the Boer Government, which, according to the Committee of the French Stockholders in the Transvaal mines, draws fifty or sixty millions of francs from the mining companies under the form of monopolies, and direct or indirect taxation.

I do not want to extend this letter to too great a length by speaking of the moral value of the Boers, of the Articles of their Constitution placing the Catholics and Jews under civil disabilities, forbidding the admission of a coloured man to the franchise, of their cruelty to the Kaffirs. On July 14 last the State Attorney, Mr. Reitz, declared, in the Raad, that it was not a dishonourable thing to whip a Kaffir to death. These things might not be considered quite relevant, though they help to see which side is working for progress and civilisation.

I will just conclude by the translation of an extract from the Figaro, which cannot be regarded as biased in favour of England. "The truth," writes the correspondent of the paper, "is that Mr. Kruger abhors foreigners; that this invincible feeling of hatred and suspicion has been the only spring of his politics during the last ten years; and that he will grant nothing which is not extorted by force."

JAMES HOCART.

Brussels, Sept. 16.

SIR,—Mr. Hopps asserts very absolutely that the renunciation of British suzerainty over the Transvaal in 1884 "is the clearest possible bit of history"; but what is his authority for that? I suspect it is nothing better than the sort of legend to that effect which appears to be current, whose origin is to be traced, I think, to a persistent and adroit advocacy of the kind that consists in treating as admitted fact the strained conclusion you are aiming at. To such sophistry Mr. Hopps appears to have fallen a victim. If he will condescend to look at the text of the two Conventions he will find they run as follows:—

The Convention of 1881 consists of a preamble whereby "complete self-government, subject to the suzerainty of Her Majesty" was "accorded to the inhabitants of the Transvaal Territory upon the following terms and conditions, and subject to the following reservations and limitations."

Then follow Articles, numbered from 1 to 33.

The Convention of 1884 consists of a preamble which, after reciting that the Government of the Transvaal State had represented that the former Convention contained certain provisions which were inconvenient, and imposed burdens and obligations from which the said State was desirous to be relieved, and that certain boundaries fixed by the former Convention should be amended, goes on to declare that the following Articles of a new Convention should be substituted for the Articles embodied in the Convention of Aug. 3, 1881.

Then follow the Articles, numbered from 1 to 20.

Inasmuch as the Convention of 1884 does not purport to supersede the Convention of 1881 as a whole, but only to substitute amended Articles for the Articles of 1881, I should have thought it perfectly clear as a matter of construction that the general status of suzerainty reserved by the preamble of 1881—whatever that may be, apart from matters particularly dealt with by the Articles—remains unaffected; nor do I know of any valid authority to the contrary.

Exposition of matters of this kind may seem out of place in your columns, but, inasmuch as dogmatic statements with regard to matters of historical fact like that which Mr. Hopps so rashly makes, would, doubtless, in the absence of any correction, be accepted as conclusive by many of your readers, I venture to ask you to insert this.

WANTED, A PIANO.

SIR,—I am writing to you in the hope that this letter will meet the eye of some friend of the London Domestic Mission who has a piano that he (or she) is willing to part with. There may be some house where the children are grown up and the "practice" piano is no longer used. Such an instrument would be of immense service to me at Bell-street. We have one piano in the large hall which we use for concerts, and often are obliged to move into other rooms for various purposes, which is bad for its constitution.

We are in great need of a second piano to use for Mrs. Gray's choir practice and singing class, and for our lads' club, one that can be kept in an upstairs room.

If any of your readers can help me in this way, and will write to me, I shall be very grateful.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.—VI.

(Conclusion.)

THE decay of English architecture at the end of the sixteenth century and the decay of English literature at the beginning of the seventeenth, were alike followed by a return to Greek and Roman models. Milton and Wren were both men of genius, and we may be thankful for the production of "Paradise Lost" in the English tongue, and for St. Paul's Cathedral on the banks of the Thames. But while the poet recognises his predecessors—"sweetest Shakespeare fancy's child" and "our sage and serious poet Spenser"—the architect could find little to admire in his English predecessors. Sir Christopher Wren admits, indeed, that there is in Gothic architecture "something solid and oddly artificial after a sort. But then," he continues, "the universal and unreasonable thickness of the walls, clumsy buttresses, towers, sharp-pointed arches, doors and other apertures without proportion; nonsensical insertions of various marbles impertinently placed; turrets and pinnacles thick set with monies and chimæras, and abundance of busy work, and other incongruities, dissipate and break the angles of the sight, and so confound it that one cannot consider it with any steadiness, where to begin or end; taking off from that noble air of grandeur, bold and graceful manner, which the ancients had so well and judiciously established."

Till the end of the eighteenth century this contempt for pure English architecture was almost universal. It is startling to think what might have been the result if, during that period, England had been as wealthy and the Church as active, as in the nineteenth century. Hundreds of village churches, and probably some even of the cathedrals, would doubtless have been contemptuously swept away to make room for new buildings in the "ancient style." Happily during that period the buildings were for the most part left alone, out of sheer indifference.

The study of them now is a source of unflinching interest and delight, though not without the difficulties and occasional disappointments and even annoyance that are attendant upon all scientific and historic study. It can only be properly approached in the first instance as a matter of science rather than art. Before all things, we must first try to understand them, and not let the question of whether we like this or that to come into consideration at all. And when we understand them we shall find ourselves brought through knowledge into intelligent sympathy, and our contemplation of them will arouse in us feelings of admiration and love, in which all questions of "liking" or "disliking" this or that particular detail seem mere impertinence.

There are the buildings; and the question how and when they came there, and why they are built thus and thus, is a matter for scientific and historical inquiry. In many cases there are historical records of their construction; and it is on these that the history of the development of English architecture is based. There are examples of each period and style, the date of which can be accurately ascertained from contemporary or almost contemporary records, sufficient amply to illustrate the whole development from the time of the Norman Conquest to the Reformation. And if, setting aside all conjecture and all buildings as to which we have no historical data, we were to arrange drawings of various buildings or parts of buildings in order of date as known from documentary evidence, it would be clear at once to the most casual observer that there was an orderly development of construction and artistic form. Various attempts were made in the latter part of the eighteenth century and early in the nineteenth to account for, classify, and name, the various styles.

In the year 1818 Thomas Rickman, who was at that time an Insurance broker's clerk in Liverpool, of forty-two years of age, published "An Attempt to Discriminate the Styles of Architecture in England from the Conquest to the Reformation." Rickman had received no training of architecture whatever; but an interest in English churches, and appreciation in their beauty, led him on to an examination of them as time and opportunity allowed, and he is said to have personally studied as many as three thousand ecclesiastical buildings.

His attempt to distinguish the styles led him to the classification under four heads of Norman, Early English, Decorated, and Perpendicular—a classification and nomenclature which has not yet been superseded, and is not likely to be.

"Notwithstanding the numerous works which have appeared in the last five or six years," says Parker, editing Rickman in 1848, "it is surprising to observe how very little real information has been added to that which Mr. Rickman collected and digested. The general accuracy of his observations, and the acuteness with which he made use of the facts he had collected, are really quite wonderful, considering that he was the first to examine the ground, and may be said to have invented a new science."

Parker and others, however, have made considerable additions to our information, and he improved somewhat upon Rickman's chronology in the division of the four styles. They fall, in any case roughly, in the four centuries, so that it is fairly correct to speak of them as twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth century architecture respectively. Parker's division is as follows:—

Norman: 1066, Norman Conquest—1189, death of Henry II.

Early English: 1189, Richard I.—1272, death of Henry III.

Decorated: 1272, Edward I.—1377, death of Edward III.

Perpendicular: 1377, Richard II.—1547, death of Henry VIII.

These may easily be remembered by the four centuries, bearing in mind that each "architectural century" begins earlier than the chronological century.

As in all cases of scientific or historical investigation, there is often a considerable amount of uncertainty as to facts when we come to details and particular examples. For some time after the discovery of the Saxon church at Bradford there was a considerable amount of discussion upon the question whether it really was an old Saxon church at all, and it is still a question whether it should be assigned to the eighth century or the tenth. Many buildings have been so much altered, and their real character and history so much obscured by injudicious "restoration," that it is difficult to say what they were originally. And it must always be borne in mind that some of our noblest buildings were, as we may almost say, alive and growing through the whole period from the end of the eleventh to the middle of the sixteenth century.

The English builders tied themselves to no unalterable plans. Each generation built in its own way. An Early English west front was built on to the Norman cathedral at Peterborough; an Early English chancel is substituted for the Norman of Durham; at Carlisle from a Norman nave and transepts we enter an Early English choir, and are confronted by a majestic Decorated east window; at Wells the building grew from the east end, built in the period of transition from Norman to Early English, to the west end which is pure Early English, but the towers are Perpendicular; at York we have Early English transepts, Decorated nave and west window, Perpendicular east window and western towers. In some of the comparatively small buildings, examples may be found of every period—as, for instance, in Wimborne Minster, in Dorsetshire, where the central portion is Norman, the choir Early English, the transepts Decorated, and the western part of the nave Perpendicular.

In England, then, building, as a purely native art, lived and grew through more than four centuries, and the churches grew with it. Nor was all this a thing apart from the national life and civilisation, and the growth of knowledge, art, and literature. The massive Norman belongs to the period of conquest and military settlement; the Early English to the time of peace and scholarship that followed; the more elaborate Decorated to the age of chivalry and poetry, the reigns of the Edwards and the days of Chaucer and Gower; the Perpendicular to the latest days of the unreformed Catholic Church in England, with all its wealth and luxury. The history of architecture is part of the history of the nation. F. H. JONES.

AN IDEAL WEEK FOR 16s.

SUCH was the offer of the Co-operative Holidays Association to any who should follow out the programme of the new Holiday Centre at the remote little village of Keld, in Swaledale, Yorkshire. To those accustomed to prices and doings at the usual crowded resorts of the British holiday-maker, this seems rather a "large order," and at an impossibly small cost. Yet I am sure that all of the many hundreds who went to Keld last August agree that the above promise was more than fulfilled.

For some of us, sooner or later, are finding out that, after all, the best things in a holiday, as in life generally, are those which cost least or cannot be bought for money. Simplicity of living; pure physical enjoyment of breathing clean, strong air, of bathing in cool, clear water, of eating huge lunches out of doors, of rambling, climbing and resting in spaciousness and loveliness; the jog to the intellect from bright "field-talks" and touch with the different minds of fellow-travellers; spiritual communion with

"The Presences of Nature in the sky
And on the earth! Ye visions of the hills!
And Souls of Lonely Places!"

"the doing one's heart good" in mutual helpfulness of semi-camp-life, and symphathetic or forbearing intercourse with friends and comrades; yes, the feel of real practical personal religion which should surely, even among the fun and frolic, be at the back of any holiday worthy of the name,

"A virtue by which pleasure is enhanced,
That penetrates, enables us to mount When high more high, and lifts us up when fallen"

all these blessings we enjoyed in largest measure at Keld.

Picture us on a Saturday afternoon arriving at the tiny railway-station of Hawes, focussing from various parts of England, chiefly from among the mills and collieries of Lancashire and Yorkshire, a party sixty strong, mostly men, with a sprinkling of women, including a few sweethearts. Then began a ten-mile walk with wonderfully alluring views of the Pennine Range and Wensley Dale, and at about 6.0 we dropped into Swaledale over the Buttertubs Pass with its weird limestone chasms.

Keld is a wee hamlet of grey stone cottages perched "no-how and anyhow" among millstone-grit rocks just above the bed of the Swale, where its cliffs are most diversified with mountain-ash and tumbling waterfalls. There are no streets, only cobblestone gangways up and down, and the absence of thoroughfare in the ordinary sense of the term is not compensated for by the one central space of the village, called by our holiday-folk, with poetic licence, "The City Square." This rendezvous hardly gave room for our cyclists to turn machines round, or for our people to hang bathing-gowns and tealochs on its railings. It just allowed wall space for a tiny Congregational chapel and manse under one roof (the latter our holiday headquarters), for the Keld schoolroom (our resort for evening sing-song), and for the Keld Literary Institute (our reading, writing, and mess room).

We slept in the cottages, and were expected to do our own chambermaid work. "I thought Keld began well," said my room-mate, "when on Sunday morning early I filled my bedroom jug at the village pipe in my dressing-gown and slippers." I thought Keld began well, when later on the same Sabbath morn I spied our Local Secretary and leader for the week (headmaster of a large public school) sitting in the manse garden on an inverted wash-basket, helping two women to pare potatoes. No wonder his eloquent appeal at our morning open-air service, to tune our lives to the Christ-Life, had the ring of actual experience in it.

On Sunday afternoon, and again on Wednesday, we had tea by the Swale, with a merry washing-up of the tea-things in the river, while we ladies wiped for the bare-legged orderlies.

At 7.30 on Monday morning, and every day for the rest of the week, our jovial lecturer sounded a bugle to summon the bathers, a bit of picturesque "campiness" of his own, which did not meet with the gratitude it deserved from the sleepy folk who did not bathe. The men tramped to a waterfall above Keld; we ladies to another fall below. Ah! the sweet early morning air, and the sun struggling over the misty heather, and the distant cry of the plover, and the fresh feel of the half-sun-warmed water and mossy rocks! Breakfast 8.30 prompt, then chores till ten (no lack of volunteers for orderlies). Then a start for the day's expedition with knapsacks on the backs of some eight or ten stalwarts. Lunch at some beck or tarn, tea at a cottage, frequent rests by the way for song. (We were a musical company and could start off almost any chorus from the "Hallelujah" to the latest comic). We sat to listen to a chat on rocks or plants by our lecturer, when we had our inquiries answered, or proudly showed our finds of fossils in the carboniferous limestone, or of butterwort and sundew in the bogs, or lucky bits of white heather among the billowy seas of purple ling. Each ramble had some new goal: cheery little Muker recovering itself from recent flood; Rogan's seat, over 2,000 ft. above sea-level among far-reaching moor and moss that seemed like the roof of the world; Swinnegill Kirk, a maze of underground caverns, where in days of persecution hunted-down dissenters had sought a temple not made with hands; Red Gulch, a spot that ought to have a romance, and so we made one, which grew in wonder and fearsomeness at each recurring visit of Co-operative Holiday-makers. These and other places we visited, always turning up again in the City Square at 6.0, when the big school-bell rang out for welcome dinner.

The time 'twixt dinner and refreshments at 8.30 was spent in vain attempts to take the midges philosophically.

But Keld, barring midges, was very good to us. Old J—A—played to us his ring o' bells, and harmonium, and marvellous harmonicon constructed by himself out of flagstones from the river-bed. The Keld mothers always had kettle boiling for a second afternoon-tea, and spared milk for these little parties in their wooden-raftered kitchens with no thought of payment—"so innercent loike," as a Bolton man remarked. Mrs. B—kept for us her best Swaledale cheese and charged nothing extra when a laddy's bed leg came through her floor. All the inhabitants were long-suffering at our pranks (politely called "village brawls") and at our turning into bed on moonlight nights long after the usual good-night time of Keld. Finally, the village brass band serenaded us during supper on the farewell Friday night.

And we tried to be good to Keld. We fed its fowls, and dogs, and babies on our scraps. We swept its City Square. We passed on our newspapers, a London "Daily" being a ten days' wonder to those remote dalesmen. We crowded half the village into our nightly "sing-song." We sang our usual Friday evening "Auld Lang Syne" under the blue vaults of heaven in one huge circle of hearty fellowship with Keld.

A strong proof that the influences of Keld holidaying reached the best part of our nature lies in the fact that we had a record collection for the Fresh Air Fund, which the Co-operative Holidays Association always distributes in our large towns for Children's Country Holidays. Some of us could ill spare the coppers that were thrown lavishly to the Fresh Air Fund song, the Fresh Air Fund crossing-sweeper, or were put in the Children's Box for the privilege of having our shoes cleaned by the boot-blackening brigade, or for having our chins manipulated by the shaving-department, presided over by the lecturer, an embryo surgeon, "2d. a victim, undertaking included." Yet we beat the average collection at the 31s. 6d. centres of the Co-operative Holidays Association, where, conventionality often absorbs the cash selfishly, and checks the feeling that "The best things any mortal hath (including holidays) are those which every mortal shares."

"Proper! Champion!" was flung freely about by enthusiastic lad and lass during this Yorkshire holiday. "I never felt fresher and gladder to return to the machine-side of life," writes the busy schoolmaster. Best tribute of all comes from a burly Yorkshireman, who returned cheered to face anxious sickness at home, and could find no other words to utter his sense of grateful refreshment than "I feel Keldish." Assuredly his had been "An Ideal Week for 16s.," one of those

"Spots of time

That with distinct pre-eminence retain
A renovating virtue whence depressed
In trivial occupations, and the round
Of daily intercourse our minds
Are nourished, and invisibly repaired."

EMILY H. SMITH.

N.B.—Information concerning the holidays arranged by the Co-operative Holidays Association (in connection with the National Home Reading Union) at the permanent Guest-Houses at Whitby and on the Gairloch and at other centres may be obtained by sending a stamped envelope to the General Secretary, Mr. T. A. Leonard, Abbey House, Whitby. The Keld or some similar holiday will be repeated next year.

THE LAW OF LIBERTY.*

"So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty."—James ii. 12.

THE law of liberty is broad in spirit but is at the same time restrictive in its nature, for unless it defined certain limits it could not be called a law.

Even in liberty, then, there is law, which none can evade or violate without evil consequences, self-degradation, and loss of moral power.

Liberty is a privilege which, unfortunately for the peace and happiness of men, is too frequently abused; and which carried beyond certain limits becomes license, developing into a most perilous pursuit of individual aims and ends. When it thus degenerates (for liberty is limited by its law to the lines of reason, justice, and truth), no presumption or folly is impossible, and the most flagrant cases of injustice, tyranny, and oppression have been witnessed under the cloak of this greatest of privileges.

Liberty stands related solely and exclusively to truth, to whatsoever is just and right, to all that is morally sound and pure. It has nothing to do with falsehood, injustice, fraud or wrong in any form or degree. So, then, no man is at liberty to speak falsely, to live dishonestly, or to violate the promptings of his conscience.

The divine law of liberty says no to all these things; it sanctions only that which is in harmony with the will of our Heavenly Father. It is permissive only in that respect. The jurisdiction of liberty is commensurate with the realm of conscience and moral order, and when a man claims the liberty to do that of which his conscience disapproves, he shows himself unfit for the exercise of the privilege which the birthright of freedom confers upon him.

We are all judged by this law; we each stand related to interests which are interwoven with its observance, and we risk, if we do not destroy, those interests, when we cease to conform to it. We possess the liberty to practise what is right, but not what is wrong. Beyond this the law of liberty ceases to be our guide, and then we are lawless.

Now it is in no narrow spirit that we wish to say something concerning the nature of fidelity to conscience and the sacred duty of being true to our convictions. A man may believe what he pleases, but he is bound in all honesty to profess what he believes, to be faithful to his thoughts. It is the duty of every man to form definite religious opinions, and to boldly and faithfully uphold them, and he has no right to pretend to the profession of others. When he has discovered the faith which suits him best, he owes that faith the duty of a manly avowal and support, devoting both body and mind to its interests.

We know it is said that belief is not the essential thing, and that a good life is of infinitely greater moment than a correct opinion; but it should be remembered that although the creed that a man holds is not everything, a good life really includes fidelity all round to every relation in which we stand; and I ask whether that is a good life which has in it an element of falseness; and whether anyone can be said to lead a good life who is not true to his convictions. "He cannot be wrong," says the poet, "whose life is in the right." But still, is the life right in which any part is untrue? And it seems to me that far too much has been carelessly said sometimes as to the relative value of life and creed, so that persons of a certain stamp have been encouraged to hold their opinions lightly and to slight the duties they involve.

Our forefathers held it to be an essential part of a good life to hold fast their integrity in such matters and to suffer, if need be, for truth and conscience sake. It is nothing less than a disaster that men should be induced by soft phrases to think that it is perfectly immaterial if they believe one thing or another. No man can take such a loose course without distinct loss to his soul, a breach of moral rectitude, and the violation of the law of liberty.

A good life is to be found in association with every sect and creed. And what we believe is perhaps of less vital consequence than our fidelity to what we believe. But if anyone thinks he can join any sect, or profess any creed, in spite of his own inmost convictions, he has loosened the armour of his righteousness and is going from the Kingdom of God. For if that inner consciousness of right be falsely dealt with, the moral perception of the individual is warped; and inconsistency in one respect may be followed by the same variation in other matters. What reason have we to expect stability in other affairs, from one having no stability in religion? A man unfaithful in religion is likely to be unfaithful in secular affairs. He has a weakness of moral balance which tends to make him unreliable. Show me a man who is shifty, who screens his license behind the sacred names of liberty, concealing his real belief from the world by pretending to pass for something else, and

I will show you a man who is scarcely to be trusted with any responsibility in any walk of life.

What can we think of a man who trifles with his own deep thoughts because perchance he sees worldly advantages in their concealment? Will he, false to himself, be true to others? He only obeys the law of liberty who implicitly submits to that which he deeply venerates, who takes part, offensive and defensive, with the just and holy against the encroachments of evil, who feels his self-denial to be his privilege, not his loss. Such a one is free because he is fettered by no power which he feels to be wrong. What we are convinced is true, should be held by us a sacred trust, to advocate, to confess before men, and to defend with energy and ardour. Our beliefs and opinions can make but little difference to God, but they make an immense difference to us, for no excuse will avail when we are brought to face the conscience to which we have been unfaithful. While then we are studious to respect the religious convictions of others, we must be true to our own. We have a line of duty which we must follow in the simple consciousness that there alone can we serve God, or belong to the kingdom of His righteousness.

So speak ye then, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty.

THE appreciation of different phases of religion in the past must make us understand better those forms of religion about us from which we are compelled to dissent. It teaches that somewhat difficult lesson—to be tolerant toward intolerance. There is something irritating in the arrogant claims of certain forms of orthodoxy. The remedy for this irritation is to learn to look at each form of orthodoxy, not merely as it now is, but as it first arose. We shall generally discover that even what is now an obstacle to progress originally arose in response to a real human need.—Samuel M. Crothers.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Banbury.—Special harvest services were held on Sept. 10, the Rev. H. Hill officiating. There was a good congregation at the evening service.

Birkenhead.—The bazaar towards the fund for the new school buildings, which it was proposed to hold in December, has, owing to the proximity of similar engagements on the part of neighbouring churches, been postponed to March. Further particulars will appear later on in these columns. Meantime communications will be gladly received by the secretaries—Miss Willmer, Lorne-road; Richard Robinson, Prenton-hill; and E. Wallace, 313, Cloughton-road, all Birkenhead.

Blackley.—The Harvest Festival Services were held on Sunday last, and were conducted by the Rev. C. Roper in the morning, and by the Rev. W. Holmshaw in the evening. In the afternoon Gaul's "Ruth" was rendered by the choir. The services were well attended, and the collections amounted to £14.

Bolton: Bank-street.—Harvest services were held on Sunday, the Rev. C. J. Street preaching in the morning, and the Rev. N. Anderton in the evening. In the afternoon the Cantata, "The Golden Sheaf," was given. The collections amounted to over £32.

Brighton.—A committee has been formed to raise a testimonial fund for the Rev. Alfred Hood, who, after a long and fruitful ministry, has been obliged to retire on account of impaired health. Councillor Wilson is chairman of the committee, Miss E. L. Boys, 59, Grand Parade, is secretary, and Mr. J. Johnson, Union Bank, is treasurer of the movement, which is not confined to sympathisers in Brighton. The Brighton Herald publishes a warmly appreciative notice of Mr. Hood's labours in that town, and we are sure that there are many in our congregations who, if only through his writings, know something of Mr. Hood's sterling worth as a man and as a teacher, and who will desire to associate themselves with the effort to cheer him with thanks and good wishes and something more.

Burton-on Trent.—In the opening of the year Unitarian services were held on Sunday afternoons in the Masonic Hall, conducted by the Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., of Derby, at the instance of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association. During the summer the services were suspended. Last Sunday evening they were resumed in the Town Hall, and are to be continued every Sunday evening at the same time and place, with religious conferences in the morning, a Sunday-school to be established soon as practicable. The preacher was the Rev. J. Birks, of Derby, who took for his text Isaiah lxiii. 16, and had a most attentive and interested congregation of from sixty to seventy people. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mrs. T. W. S. Hull, of Derby, and gave every satisfaction.

Chatham.—On Sunday last the Harvest Thanksgiving was held. There were large congregations, especially in the evening, when the church was overcrowded. At the conclusion of each service signatures were obtained for a memorial, expressing sympathy with Mme. Dreyfus.

Chichester.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday last. Sermons by the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott. In the evening the chapel was filled, and the offertories exceeded those of former years.

Cifton.—A large congregation assembled at Oakfield Road Church on Sunday night, where the Rev. Dr. Warschauer was announced to preach on "The Dreyfus Verdict." The preacher began by comparing the Rennes trial with that of Christ before Pilate. Though the course of the trial had left little hope of a favourable issue, yet when the verdict became known, a moan of despair broke out in every part of the world—a moan which swelled into a cry of baffled rage and execration. France had had her last opportunity of being reinstated in the comity of nations, and, having cynically rejected it, had made herself an outcast. The crime was one for which the whole nation was responsible, for without a corrupt public opinion to rely on, the Court-martial would not have dared to pass its iniquitous verdict—which had, moreover, been received throughout France with "calm" and "satisfaction." He hoped Englishmen would not make themselves accessories after the fact by visiting the proposed Paris Exhibition; he hoped above all the victim would not accept the insult of a pardon now talked of—it was justice, not pardon, that was his due. At the close of the service a telegram of sympathy was despatched to the prisoner at Rennes, a copy being likewise telegraphically transmitted to his wife.

Dover.—This last week our town has been en fete on the occasion of the visit of the British Association. On Sunday, Sept. 17, we held our harvest festival, when our church was tastefully decorated by members of the congregation. The Rev. S. Burrows preached morning and evening, his subjects being: "The Conflict of Science with Mythology" and "Some Contributions of Science to Theology." On Sept. 10 a presentation of six volumes of the "Bible for Young People" was made to Miss L. Smith, in recognition of her earnest work in connection with the Sunday-school, and on the occasion of her leaving the town.

Edinburgh.—The Rev. R. B. Drummond, preaching in St. Mark's Chapel last Sunday on "L'Affaire Dreyfus," said:—"As to the verdict itself, indeed, now that time has been given us to reflect upon it, we could almost afford to treat it lightly—as something merely formal, disgraceful indeed to its authors, but having no force or validity whatever; for this verdict cannot stand. Assuredly some way will be found of quashing a sentence so directly in the teeth of the evidence, so manifestly dictated by invincible prejudice and subservience to official authority. What are the compensations? In the first place, this cruel persecution, disgracing the closing years of the century, has it not produced one of the noblest examples of heroism that history has to show? Talk of Plutarch's heroes, of the religious martyrs of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries! This obscure French captain will take a high place among them all; the name of Dreyfus will be handed down to future ages as that of the greatest martyr hero of the present century. But the most satisfactory thing of all is the universal feeling of indignation—the common sense of an outrage committed upon all that is most precious in human life—that has been called forth from men of every class and every nation—not certainly excepting France herself, that better France which we all know exists, and which, though in the first moments of unreason it has run into some not unnatural extravagances, lives to prove that the sense of justice is alive and vigorous in the great heart of humanity." Mr. Drummond then entered on a detailed notice of the "affaire," giving full credit to Colonel Picquart and M. Zola for their noble and self-sacrificing efforts in the cause of justice and innocence.

General Baptist Assembly.—The 246th annual meeting of this Assembly took place on Monday and Tuesday at Portsmouth. Our report of the proceedings is unavoidably deferred till next issue.

Guildford.—The Daily Chronicle letter of sympathy to Madame Dreyfus was laid before the members of this congregation for signature last Sunday.

Horwich.—The members of the congregation have set themselves to raise a sum of £1,000 for the purpose of redeeming the ground rents, which amount to close upon £30 a year, and to form an independent fund. When this is accomplished they will be in a position to require less aid from the funds of the North and East Lancashire Mission Committee than is the case at present. They have recently found a most generous helper in Mrs. Samuel Fielden, of Todmorden, who has contributed £100 to the fund. Towards the attainment of the end in view it was decided some months ago to hold a grand bazaar early in November. It is hoped that a sum of not less than £500 will be realised at the bazaar. The officers of the Mission Committee have given a hearty recommendation to an appeal for help which has been issued. Evidences of a generous support from without are not wanting. Ladies in different centres have consented to receive parcels for the bazaar and to further its interests as best they can. Bolton will be represented by a Bank-street Chapel stall.

Llwynrhodwen.—Although there has been no regular ministry here for the past three years, the pulpit has been unfailingly supplied by friends. The new "Marriage Act, 1898," has been adopted, a registrar has been appointed, and other conditions complied with. About 200 children and friends attended a picnic held recently, the hosts being Captain Davies, Rhydowenfach, and Miss Jones, Newgate. On the 10th inst. twenty-six members, all adults, were added to the church, Mr. E. O. Jenkins, who has preached on the past few Sundays, receiving them with an impressive address.

London: Bermondsey.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday last. Thanks to the generosity of friends, the decorations were as excellent as usual. Many parents and Sunday scholars were present at the evening service, which was of a highly encouraging character. The services were conducted by Mr. Rylett.

Mansfield.—On Sunday evening the Rev. H. S. Perris preached on the subject of the troubles in the Transvaal. He strongly deprecated the policy of armed intervention, still more a policy of aggrandisement. With The Hague Conference freshly in mind, it was deplorable that so many people apparently were abandoning counsels of moderation. The victory of battle would bring untold evils in its train, and he besought his hearers to use their power as citizens to influence the Government in favour of peaceful negotiations.

Nottingham.—On the 13th a soiree was held in the High Pavement School-room to bid farewell to the Rev. W. E. Addis, M.A., and Mrs. Addis. Mr. Addis resigned his charge in June last on his appointment to the chair of Old Testament language and literature at Manchester College, Oxford. There was a very large attendance of members and friends of the congregation. The chair was taken by Mr. J. O. Warren (senior warden), and among those also present, in addition to Mr. and Mrs. Addis, were Messrs. W. Clark and H. A. Dowson (wardens), the Rev. W. Lindsay (Christ Church), Messrs. G. R. Cowen, B. Dowson, Jesse Hind, J.P., E. Smith, J. Warren, J. T. Perry, F. Perry, R. A. Keating, B. Stiebel, S. Bourne, J. R. Evans, W. Hugh, G. Bryan, W. Goddard, R. F. Hardy, and J. W. Wright. Letters of apology for absence were read from Alderman Goldschmidt and Mr. Henry Jacoby. Mr. Warren, on behalf of the congregation, expressed to Mr. and Mrs. Addis the great regret felt at their departure, and the sincere affection and esteem in which they were held. He thanked Mr. Addis for his efforts for their welfare and for the kindness, friendship, and sympathy he had shown them, and assured him of their warm good wishes for the future welfare and happiness of himself and his family in their new home at Oxford. In conclusion, he asked Mr. Addis's acceptance of a dining-room clock and a cheque for one hundred guineas, and presented Mrs. Addis with a token of the congregation's regard. In reply, Mr. Addis said that they would not expect him to say all he felt, but he must thank them in his wife and children's names, as well as his own, for their gifts and for the affection which he was sure they carried away with them. In looking forward, Mr. Warren had spoken of the attractions of the new life that was before them. They hoped that it might be a bright and honourable one, but it must not be supposed that they failed to recognise the attractions of Nottingham or to carry a sense of those attractions with them. He was leaving Nottingham under a sense of duty, coming to the conclusion it was for the best. It was not all pleasure to him in any way, and when he made up his mind to go he had no idea he should feel the parting so deeply as at that moment. When he came among them he felt, though not an old man, that he could not easily make new friendships. He was mistaken, and he had made friendships which he and his family would long cherish. It was a very difficult task to say good-bye. He was very sorry to part from them, and from none more than their friends, Mr. Lindsay and Mr. Maley, than whom no congregations ever possessed better ministers. When a man went, whether by death or removal, he perhaps should be judged, not so much by what he had accomplished as by what, in his best moments, he would fain have done. He left them in the confidence that they should always have this judgment of charity at their hands, and that they would all live in kindly and affectionate remembrance.

Stannington.—On Sunday harvest services were held, the preacher being the Rev. Iden Payne. Notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather there was a large congregation in the afternoon, while in the evening every seat was occupied. On Monday evening a service of song, entitled "Farmer Forest's Thanksgiving," was rendered, and again there was a very good attendance.

Tavistock.—Harvest services were held last Sunday. The Rev. John Barron preached morning and evening. In the evening the church was well filled.

Todmorden.—The last monthly religious service for the policemen of the district was conducted by our minister, the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A. On Sunday last the harvest festival services were held. The resident minister preached three appropriate and eloquent sermons, the one in the afternoon being specially addressed to the children. The choir gave special music, and good congregations assembled at all the services. Gifts of grapes and flowers were forwarded to the sick and infirm at the close of the evening service. The collections, together with the sum realised at a sale of vegetables, &c., on Monday night, amounted to £25.

MEN do not respond to music unless they have the musical sense. The moment a soul is in tune with the heavenly harmonies, that soul vibrates in unison with them, easily believes that the universe is a vast symphony, and becomes not only a sharer, but an interpreter and utterer of songs that seem worthy of angels.—C. G. Ames.

THE BOOK OF BANDER.

A Scripture-form Story of Past and Present Times. By the Author of the "New Koran." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

It records the efforts of a "Church of Cofriends" to correct ancient errors, to reconcile the Jews, Christians, and Moslems of Syria on the basis of pure Theism, and generally to promote amity among all groups and grades of mankind in spite of their natural differences. The broad-minded will most respect its teaching, and there is reason to believe that it will be appreciated and found useful by reformers of various schools who have been favourably impressed with its companion work in scriptural style and arrangement.

"The New Koran is exactly the opposite of the Book of Mormon. Its narratives are short and varied, interesting and life-like, and there is not a page or paragraph without its useful lessons. It is as readable as 'Robinson Crusoe,' and as instructive as Theodore Parker's Sermons. . . . Young and old, rich and poor, rulers and subjects, may read it with equal pleasure and equal profit."—Barker's Review.

"He speaks through the mouth of one Jaido Morata, who is a preacher calling all religionists to a sense of brotherly feeling, denouncing their vices and follies, and exhorting them to pursue the path of rectitude. The work is eminently readable, is far from being pedantic or dogmatic, and displays an amount of keen reflection which proves the writer to be an astute thinker and profound observer of the actions and thoughts of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans."—Jewish World.

"It is an exquisite and delicate instrument for the healing of men's strifes and for combining an untiring energy towards progress with a grateful contentment under the difficulties and troubles of life. . . . May we all do our best to learn for ourselves, and then teach to others the lovely lessons of truth and virtue which this book contains, so that we and they may reach that region of sound and calm judgment where the follies and traill's of our childhood cannot follow us."—Sermon by the Rev. C. Voysey.

"We very sincerely trust that its diffusion will not be retarded by what a liberal mind ought to regard as the eminent merit of sturdy independence of all the reigning schools of thought. . . . Objective, dramatic, impressive, aphoristic, pregnant with thought and transparent in expression, it has every requisite for public recitation, while far more than a 'forty person power' of homilist would be needed to exhaust its manifold suggestiveness."—Review by Dr. Richard Garnett.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE note with satisfaction from time to time the signs that our Nonconformist brethren are not all content to cut themselves aloof from Unitarians at the bidding of the National Federation Council. We should be the last to encourage any of them to create useless disturbances: the great causes for which they meet together in their Free Church Councils are of far more importance, certainly, than any mere compliment to us. But when the unwisdom and absurdity of the exclusive policy strikes our orthodox brethren afresh, as it does from time to time, it is good to observe one and another making a simple and straightforward protest against it. The latest instance to hand is that of the Councils of South Durham and Cleveland. At a meeting held at Stockton, Sept. 13, the Rev. E. Hind, of Middlesbrough, replying to an intimation that a "difficulty" with the Council of his town had "ended," observed that it was not so. He and others on the local Council wished to continue the inclusion of Unitarians. Other speakers expressed sympathy with his views; but it was pointed out that the proper course was to protest against the Constitution of the Federation and get the obnoxious article repealed. It was explained by the Rev. T. Law, organising secretary of the National Council, that on a representation from the officials to the Unitarian friends at Middlesbrough the latter had decided to withdraw quietly from the local Council. Perhaps that was the best course to adopt, under the circumstances; but we are glad the orthodox and the unorthodox Middlesbrough friends have drawn so closely together, and we can wait a little for the movement to become general.

THE Rev. Dr. M. J. Savage, who was in London a short time ago (and, we regret to add, not in the best of health), has been interviewed on the subject of the late Colonel Ingersoll. He describes the celebrated agnostic lecturer in eulogistic terms, as regards his personal character, his private beneficence being unstinted and his sincerity being beyond question. Dr. Savage thought the secret of Ingersoll's opposition to orthodoxy lay in the sensitiveness of his nature, which led him to revolt with horror from the cruel things calmly held up to be believed in. On one occasion Dr. Savage saw him and his family before him in a congregation at Washington, and as he preached he noticed the extremely simple and sympathetic manner in which Ingersoll listened, now breaking out into a smile, now with tears rolling down his cheeks. "He has said to me more than once," says Dr. Savage, "that he wanted as far as possible to break down the old theological conceptions that filled the human heart with fears and made the future a horror. He told me once that he had no objection to the kind of religion that I represented. 'Indeed,' he said, 'I am only clearing the ground and making way for the kind of work that you are trying to do.'" Dr. Savage says he believed him to have been truly an agnostic, and not an atheist or unbeliever in the future life. The God of the popular creeds he did not believe in, but his criticisms would not, in Dr. Savage's opinion, hit or hurt the views of a liberal, a theist evolutionist.

IF anyone with a turn for pessimism felt inclined to indulge his melancholy temperament, he would surely find enough in events present and recent to justify a gloomy mood. The crop of deplorable incidents—deplorable especially from the point of view of one who yearns for signs of progress in the best things, righteousness and brotherhood—has been startlingly rich in these closing years of the nineteenth century. The atrocities in Armenia, the Dreyfus case, the persecution of the Stundists and of the Jews, the Jameson raid and the hushing up of the public inquiry into that outrage, the crushing of free speech in Germany, and—as a latest contribution—the scandalous trial for treason which has just taken place in Serbia, make up a group of historical phenomena likely, we should say, to attract the notice of the most optimist and give him pause. Add to all, the fact that we appear to be plunging into one of the maddest as well as one of the worst wars in our country's history, and this after all the fine speeches and writings of the century—and the cup would seem to be full. But, sursum corda! there are, at the worst of times, seven thousand that have not bowed the knee to Baal; and we believe the shame of these shameful things will by and by grow too keen for their repetition. At present we can do little more than cry shame upon them; but this, at least, we will do.

THE Baptist Union has been holding its annual Conference at Leeds this week, being very largely attended. On Wednesday, the Rev. Dr. Clifford, President, made a stirring appeal against the war-spirit. He said he did not for one moment despair of realising bright anticipations of the coming century, because of the appalling difficulties facing us at the immediate moment in South Africa. He would not believe that the resources of reason and conciliation were exhausted, and that there was no other way of removing the misunderstandings and suspicions which had arisen, and giving justice and liberty to the Uitlanders, than that of the brutal sword and the destructive Maxim gun. Take the assessment of the evils suffered by our fellow-countrymen in the Transvaal made by the yellowest paper of the Yellow Press and allow the truth of every item in the account. Still, he asked, were they, the disciples of Jesus and the followers of the Prince of Peace, reduced to the awful extremity of letting loose the dogs of war? Were they, the leaders of modern civilisation, flung back on such imbecility of statesmanship that they could not settle questions of franchise and free speech without an internal duel and entering upon what Mr. Chamberlain had described as "a long war, a bitter war, and a costly war," and a war "the memory of which generations would hardly be able to blot out." Let us take the higher path again, and even if it should be more toilsome and exacting, it would surely lead to those "far shining table lands" of justice and brotherhood of which "our God Himself is both sun and moon."

THE members and delegates of the Union, no doubt, include amongst them politicians of different party sympathies, but a resolution on the Transvaal question, proposed by the Rev. S. Vincent, of Plymouth, received unanimous support. It was as follows :—

That this assembly, having seen with sorrow the relations between this country and the Transvaal grow more and more strained in the course of long protracted negotiations, and fully recognising the difficulties which beset Her Majesty's Government and the great grievances of which the Uitlanders have long complained, yet earnestly prays the Government, in view of our great strength, and of the horrors and racial hatreds certain to spring from a war with the Boers, still to be so patient and moderate that all the world may see our desire to avoid strife in securing justice; and this assembly will pray God to give here and in the land treated in 1881 with great magnanimity by Great Britain, such a reasonable mind that our controversies may be forthwith settled without evasion or procrastination.

We trust the rising tide of feelings like those expressed in this resolution will continue to flow, and that it may not be without effect upon the issue.

THE Rev. C. J. Street, preaching at Buxton on Lord Halifax's manifesto to the English Church Union, pointedly summed up the position in his concluding sentences. He said, after expressing astonishment that Lord Halifax should say and believe that "the use of incense enters into the very marrow of public worship"—

This whole business about incense and lights in public worship must have been a simple revelation to many people, as it was to the preacher himself. If this Archbishops' judgment had not happened and all this clamour been made by High Church people in consequence of it, one could not have believed that there were people in the world at the present time, people presumably of some intelligence and education too as to many of them, who would have acted so. The question as to whether these people are doing all they can to lead England back to Rome again or not, is not the one that need cause any anxiety just now. For if England is willing to be either led or driven to Rome—in that sense—let her go by all means. But what one need be astonished at and grieved for most of all is that an age, characterised more than any other in the world's history for its advancement in various realms of human knowledge, should yet, in that realm which ought to be the highest and best understood of all—the realm of religion—be so backward and slow to learn; that the greatest Church of Christ in Great Britain should at this time, above all others, have developed within itself a large body of men and women—an ever-increasing multitude indeed—who seem so lost to the true sense and instinct and meaning of Christ's religion, that they can and do attach grave importance to a bit of burning incense and a little melting wax; that men and women can now be found in large numbers in England who with almost heathenish devotion worship such infinitely small idols as these:—this is the thing to be astonished at and to grieve over; for this is more than enough to make Christ weep bitter tears over his loved but lost Jerusalem once more, and to make him say from his place in heaven to this branch of his Church on earth:—"Have I been so long time with thee and yet hast thou not known me."

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE UPON THE CRISIS.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove delivered a sermon in Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds, on Sunday morning, that had direct bearing upon the present attitude of this country towards the Transvaal. Mr. Hargrove took as his text Judges xx. 18 and 28—"And the children of Israel arose and went up to the house of God, and asked counsel of God, saying, Shall I go out to battle against the children of Benjamin, my brother, or shall I cease?" This was a shocking story, said the speaker, of the days when as yet "there was no King in Israel," and "every man did that which was right in his own eyes." Yet from it we may get a lesson worthy of attention, and fit for a warning in our own time. This war between Israel and Benjamin had a distinctly moral motive. That was one point worthy of note. Another was that the text showed evidence of a desire to seek counsel of God ere entering on battle, or even consulting the elders or the people. These things are written for us of to-day, said Mr. Hargrove; but there is much to risk when the preacher turns from generalities accepted by all to the events of the passing hour. On these latter men and women form their own opinions, or accept the judgment of their party or their newspaper; and they may reasonably object to have other opinions forced upon their attention. The minister of religion, in particular, must be reluctant to take advantage of his pulpit and castle, where none may question him, to urge his own views upon the affairs of the day. Yet there are occasions when silence is impossible, and the present, said Mr. Hargrove, is one of them. A few days more and there would be no room left for remonstrance or protest. If there was anything to be said, it must surely be uttered now. Why should we fight the Transvaal? "For revenge?" We were defeated at Majuba Hill, and made an ignominious peace with them, who had the advantage of us. It was years ago, but the memory had not been blotted out. It ill becomes a mighty Empire to sit down tamely under defeat from a puny foe. "Be it so," continued the reverend gentleman. "I will not return upon the history of Majuba Hill, and the treaty, which the magnanimity of England, not the might of the Boer, then accomplished. Let it be as stated. But surely we call ourselves Christians, Conservatives and Liberals, soldiers and civilians, Imperialists and those nicknamed Little Englanders. And dare we speak the word—dare we cherish the thought, 'Revenge'? Revenge for an old wrong, which, even if a wrong, the years should have wiped out. Yet who can doubt that this has much to do with the clamour for war? But, say some, we are about to fight on behalf of our countrymen denied the rights of citizenship by the very men to whom we so generously forgave defeat. I will not insist that it is wrong to go to war to redress the grievances of the Uitlanders," said Mr. Hargrove, "but I will demand with such right as I have as a citizen, and such petty authority as I have as a minister of religion, that these questions be fully answered to the satisfaction, not of a secret council, but of the whole nation. Leeds is dumb. Leeds, which, twenty years ago, when a warlike policy was to the fore, spoke with such a voice of command that all the world heard of it; Leeds, which more than any other single constituency in the kingdom determined the defeat of the War party in 1880; Leeds has no word now for the kingdom or the world! No time to spare from its business and its pleasure for such alien concerns as peace or War! My voice will not carry. I cannot make myself heard by the country, or even by my own city. But insignificance does not free a man of responsibility. As minister of this ancient chapel, I have said my say, have seen the sword coming, and given warning. From this pulpit, at any rate, has gone out the word, not against the Government of the day, nor on behalf of a change of Ministry, but that before we go out to battle against our Dutch brethren, we take the matter to the house of God and ask, 'Is it right?' Does God give us warrant to draw the sword to slay our brethren?"

CAN WE BE NEUTRAL?*

BY THE REV. H. GOW.

THERE have been few questions more difficult and involved, to my mind, than the problem of peace or war which our nation has to face to-day. Willingly we must admit that the Government of the country knows far more than we can possibly know. Willingly we should admit that their authority ought to count for a good deal in helping us make up our mind. But it must not count for everything. We are free citizens of a free country and bound to try and come to some conclusions for ourselves, not to be driven like sheep wherever our leaders please.

"There may be reasons not yet apparent," said Sir Edward Clarke the other day, "why we should go to war with the Transvaal, but we have a right to know them before we are committed to such a war." That, I think, those of us who are neutral through ignorance are absolutely justified in urging on our Government. "We don't oppose you: we try not to distrust you: you may be right," we say. "But you have not shown the thinking people of this country adequate reasons for war; still less have you convinced the conscience of our nation that it would be a righteous war; and we are not prepared—surely none of us are prepared—to hand over our reason and conscience to the wisest and most moral Government that ever existed. Before God we are not justified in thus committing moral and intellectual suicide." This then a "neutral through ignorance," wretched at his neutrality, and eager for more knowledge may urge. Tell me your reasons, convince my conscience, and I will support you; but I am certain of one thing amidst my ignorance, you have not done so yet. Moral enthusiasm is the very last and most absurd term that could be used to describe the national feeling about this war to-day. Until you have convinced me, I am against war with all my soul.

And surely we may go even a little further in our ignorance. We are ignorant of the reasons for war, but we are not ignorant of the horrors of war, nor are we ignorant of the history of the Dutch in South Africa. They are obstinate, narrow, even morose perhaps, but suffering much at our hands, and with a love of independence as strong as our own. Even if we are absolutely in the right, I think the conscience of this nation demands that we should be as long-suffering and magnanimous as possible with little peoples, and above all with a little people who are Dutch. Their history is the most glorious next to our own in modern Europe. They are like our own Puritan forefathers in their sturdiness and hatred of interference, as well as in a certain narrowness and bigotry. We may object strongly to the bigotry, but are we prepared with a good conscience to shoot them for it? It is a frightful position in which we stand. Every good man and woman must hate the idea of this war with all their heart and soul. In our ignorance we may not be prepared to say it is utterly wrong, but we are very sure it has not been proved to us to be right.

God help us and all the men and women in this nation, and those who are set in authority over us, that they may know and choose the way of righteousness.

* From a sermon preached at Leicester last Sunday.

THOREAU AND HIS TEACHING.—II.

STANDING by Thoreau's grave, Emerson said: "The country knows not yet, or in least part, how great a son it has lost. . . . His soul was made for the noblest society: he had in a short life exhausted the capabilities of this world: wherever there is knowledge, wherever there is virtue, wherever there is beauty, he will find a home." And we ask, what, after all, was Thoreau? What did he, or what has he written, to call forth such high praise? His life was very pure—very picturesque—but is he not as R. L. Stevenson called him, "a skulker," who "as good as stole his livelihood" on this earth, evading the cares and toils that oppress and yet ennoble other men? He did not choose this lonely path; it was the only one he could follow faithfully. "We shall one day see," said his eulogist once, "that the most private is the most public energy, that quality atones for quantity, and grandeur of character acts in the dark, and succours them who never saw it." We may not all think thus: we are not sure that Thoreau did. And it was a very different type of character—the public, heroic, energetic character of an Abolitionist leader—that called forth his intensest admiration. But he never measured his own spiritual stature by that of other men. He did not aim to be the best man in the world, but to be the best Thoreau. He would have no man to follow him, but every man to follow the highest instinct of his own nature, and dare, if so led, to make tracks into the Unknown, rather than swerve from his integrity to pursue a more frequented road.

If he did not preach the perennial nobleness of work like Carlyle, it was not because he did not feel it, but because he felt yet more strongly that

"Getting and spending we lay waste our powers,

Little we see in Nature that is ours,
We have given our hearts away."

If he withdrew from human society, and seemed to lavish all his love and devotion on Nature, it was not because he had no love for his fellow-men, but because he sought and craved for absolute truth and purity of heart, and in conventional society he seldom found it. When Thoreau is reproached for his selfish seclusion, it should not be forgotten that he always welcomed the society of children, and of the simple country folk whom he met in his rambles, and that some of his cottage hosts and hostesses would give another account of him.

And if he does not speak much of religion, does not call himself a Christian, and has little respect for the rites and dogmas of the Church, it is not because he lacks faith or reverence, but because the Churches he knew seemed to him to lack both faith and reverence. "The wisest man preaches no doctrines: he has no scheme: he sees no rafter, not even a cobweb, against the heavens. It is clear sky."

It has been remarked by Professor Seeley how, "Ever since the worship of God founded too exclusively on supernaturalism began to decay, the worship of God in Nature has shown signs of reviving." Natural religion, no less than the religion of the Church, has inspired its poets, its priests, its saints.

Wordsworth [says Seeley] declares himself a worshipper of Nature, and in the most deliberate manner asserts over and over again that in this worship he found all the satisfaction—the lasting inward peace, the occasional rapture—that can flow from the best religion. . . . Nature, taken in the large, inspired him with faith, because the contemplation of it filled him with a happiness his mind could scarcely contain. As the scepticism of most men is founded upon their experience that the universe does not supply their wants, does not seem to have in view their happiness, so the faith of Wordsworth was founded upon his own happy contrary experience.

So it was with Thoreau. And this, not because he always walked on the sunny side of life, not because his eyes "avert their ken from half of human fate," but because it was an instinct of his nature to find the "soul of goodness in things evil," and to illumine with his own invincible optimism the shadows that fell across his path.

Think, for example, of that scene at Cape Cod, as it has been described by Thoreau, and as it might have been described by a more pessimistic observer. He had gone with a friend to the seashore to take his first look at the Atlantic. It was in October, and there had been wild weather at sea, and as the travellers came near to the shore they heard rumours of a terrible shipwreck. An emigrant ship had foundered just outside the bay, and the waves had flung her freight about on the sand for burial in the land of promise. The people of the place had been busy carting them away in rude coffins, and still these gruesome boxes lay piled about ready for removal, and still the waves were strewing more victims along the strand. It is a terrible scene that Thoreau's vivid language brings before us, and we expect him to turn from it with a shudder of revulsion. But no, he gazes on the distant wreck, and the dark objects making their slow way thence through the surf, and he reflects:—

Why care for these dead bodies? They really have no friends but the worms or fishes. Their owners were coming to the New World—as Columbus and the Pilgrims did—they were within a mile of its shores: but before they could reach it, they emigrated to a newer world than ever Columbus dreamed of, yet one of whose existence we believe that there is far more universal and convincing evidence—though it has not yet been discovered by science—than Columbus had of this: not merely mariner's tales and some paltry driftwood and seaweed, but a continual drift and instinct to all our shores. I saw their empty hulks that came to land; but they themselves, meanwhile, were cast upon some shore yet further west, towards which we are all tending, and which we shall all reach at last, it may be through storm and darkness, as they did. . . . The mariner who makes the safest port in heaven, perchance, seems to his friends on earth to be shipwrecked, for they deem Boston Harbour the better place: though perhaps invisible to them, a skilful pilot comes to meet him, and the fairest and balmiest gales blow off that coast: his good ship makes the land in halcyon days, and he kisses the shore in rapture there while his old hulk tosses in the surf here. . . . The strongest wind cannot stagger a Spirit: it is a Spirit's breath. A just man's purpose cannot be split on any material rock, but itself will split rocks till it succeeds.

Thoreau's unworldliness—some would call it inhumanity—strikes us everywhere. Nothing but what is pure, and beautiful, and spiritual and true seems to make any deep impression on him. He felt little interest in the things that absorb most men: he did not care to sully his thoughts with the newspaper—at all events, more than once a week. He thought he could do quite well without the Post Office.

"We should treat our minds, i.e., ourselves, as innocent and ingenuous children, whose guardians we are, and be careful what we thrust on their attention. Read not the Times. Read the Eternities. Conventionalities are at length as bad as impurities. Even the facts of science may dust the mind by their dryness, unless they are in a sense effaced each morning—or rather, rendered fertile by the dews of fresh and living truths."

Let us consider the way in which we spend our lives. . . . This world is a place of business. There is no Sabbath. It is nothing but work, work, work. . . . Most men, even in this comparatively free country, through mere ignorance and mistake, are so occupied with the factitious cares, and superfluously coarse labours of life that its finer fruits cannot be plucked by them. Their fingers, from excessive toil, are too clumsy and tremble too much, for that. Actually, the labouring man has not leisure for a true integrity day by day: he cannot afford to sustain the manliest relations to men: his labour would be depreciated in the market. He has no time to be anything but a machine. How can he remember well his ignorance, which his growth requires—who has so often to use his knowledge? . . .

If I should sell both my forenoons and afternoons to Society, as most appear to do, I am sure that for me there would be nothing left worth living for. I trust I shall never thus sell my birthright for a mess of pottage. I wish to suggest that a man may be very industrious, and yet not spend his time well. There is no more fatal blunderer than he who consumes the greater part of his life getting his living.

But what does this dreamer of Walden Woods know about getting a living?—he whom

The purple berries in the wood Supplied with necessary food who

Could with gods on mallows dine
Nor cared for spices or for wine?

Since Thoreau's time we have heard much of the struggle for existence, and when we see its operation among men and women, are prone to think of it as a natural law which must work out its own end. It is a natural law, doubtless, but not so cruel and degrading as men have made it. It is no law of Nature, but man's inhumanity to man, and unscrupulous self-indulgence, that makes such a pitiful parody of human life. And this not wanton inhumanity, but often mere thoughtlessness, and the stress of needs that are not real needs, but just those useless wants against which Thoreau made it his mission to protest. Could we all live more simply, dispense with some things that Society requires of us, not preach to the poor what we do not practise ourselves, but strive with them after somewhat of Thoreau's spirit, our social problems would not indeed be solved, but they would be simplified.

Thoreau took part in no philanthropic enterprise. He probably felt less pity for the poor than for the rich. He himself was poor, and had found poverty a good thing. "Humility, like darkness, reveals the heavenly lights." But he watched the charitable work of others with interest and discernment, and could sometimes see further than they.

Be sure [he said] that you give the poor the aid they most need—though it be your example which leaves them far behind.

If you give money, spend yourself with it, and do not merely abandon it to them. . . . There are a thousand hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root, and it may be that he who bestows the largest amount of time and money on the needy is doing the most by his mode of life to produce that misery which he strives in vain to relieve. . . . Some show their kindness to the poor by employing them in their kitchens. Would they not be kinder if they employed themselves there?

If Thoreau took no active part in the great struggle which then absorbed all the noblest of his fellow-countrymen, it was not through apathy or fear. All his sympathy was with the slaves, and he did all he could for the fugitives who came in his way. The news that a runaway slave had been captured and returned to his master by the State of Massachusetts, thrilled him with shame and indignation, and drew from him the public protest for which he spent a night in Concord gaol. When the Abolitionist leader, John Brown, was arrested and condemned for inciting an insurrection of slaves at Harpers Ferry, no argument or entreaty could keep Thoreau silent. When the Abolitionist Committee urged him, for the sake of prudence, to refrain for a while, Thoreau replied: "I did not send to you for advice, but to announce that I am to speak!" And speak he did—an eloquent, impassioned pleading for the prisoner—not, as he said, "for his life, but for his character—his immortal life." It was no fault of Thoreau's, says Stevenson, that he was not martyred: he would have made a noble ending.

As of labour, so of love and friendship, Thoreau speaks from a place apart—as an onlooker who has keenly observed, but never fully experienced, the ruling passions of other men. He never felt the want of Society: Nature gave him that. But he did need Friendship—the sympathy and love of a few kindred souls—and few have ever conceived this rare relation more nobly, or enjoyed it more reverently.

"Between whom there is hearty truth, there is love, and in proportion to our truthfulness and confidence in one another our lives are divine, and answer to our ideal.

"The friend asks no return but that his friend will religiously accept and wear and not disgrace his apotheosis of him. They cherish each other's hopes. They are kind to each other's dreams. . . .

"Beware lest thy Friend learn at last to tolerate one frailty of thine. There are times when we have had enough even of our friends, when we begin inevitably to profane one another, and must withdraw religiously into solitude and silence, the better to prepare ourselves for a loftier intimacy."

Friendship, to Thoreau, is a sacrament; it is at once the motive and reward of noble character, and calls forth and strengthens all that is divine in us.

"For a companion, I require one who will make an equal demand on me with my own genius. . . . I value and trust those who love and praise my aspiration rather than my performance.

I cannot leave my sky
For thy caprice,
True love would soar as high
As heaven is."

We need not point to the flaws in Thoreau's life and teaching: they are evident, and none knew them better than himself. But, he said, "I wish to make an extreme statement if so I may make an emphatic one": and he did not fear to be extravagant if only he could make men think.

Love had he found in huts where poor men lie;

His daily teachers had been woods and rills;

The silence that is in the starry sky,

The sleep that is among the lonely hills.

And the lessons of truth, and faith, and purity—that he learned from these silent teachers, he tried to utter to his fellow-men. Be natural; be true to your own ideal; cultivate what is best in you, caring not what others think or say, for "Public opinion is a weak tyrant compared with our own private opinion. What a man thinks of himself, that it is which determines, or rather indicates, his fate." And then to his wealth-loving countrymen, he says:—Be simple: do not spend your whole life in getting luxurious living: give yourself time to think and to see: live deliberately, and know what you live for: do not pamper your body and starve your soul. "Superfluous wealth can buy superfluities only: money is not needed to buy one necessary of the soul."

Thoreau, says Lowell, "took Nature as the mountain-path to an ideal world." We may each have our own way of ascent; but by whatever path they climb, the true and pure in heart will wear winged sandals, and soonest reach those tranquil heights where, with Browning, they will exclaim:—

O world, as God has made it, all is beauty!
And knowing this is love, and love is duty.

THE GRACE OF GIVING AND RECEIVING.

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.

"There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water: Jesus saith unto her, Give me to drink. The Samaritan woman therefore saith unto him, How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a Samaritan woman?"—John iv. 7-9.

WE, too, like the woman of Samaria, may feel at first a little surprised by the request. Jesus meets a woman who was a stranger and belonging to a race bitterly hostile to his own, and he begins his acquaintance with her by asking a service. We might have expected that he would begin by trying to do something for her, but instead of that he begins by getting her to do something for him. That is a mark of the instinctive tact of Jesus. It is one of the surest methods of gaining affection. Get your enemy to help you, and he begins to love you in spite of himself. I do not mean that the request of Jesus was part of an elaborate scheme for overcoming the woman's enmity. Such a method would be utterly unworthy of Jesus, and if it were only a clever artificial scheme it would have defeated itself. But I do mean that the loveliness of Jesus, the affection and respect and devotion which he inspired were due quite as much to his dependence upon others, the claims he made on them, the opportunities for helping him that he gave, as upon his own unbounded generosity and his love of helping those who were in need. It sounds paradoxical, but I believe it is profoundly true that one of the greatest services we can do for others is to enable them to help us, to feel and let them feel that they can help us. The continual exhortation to do good to others, to give hoping for nothing again, to be like a pump always pouring out, although it is of the essence of Christianity, is yet in danger of being a little one-sided and wearisome. I do not want to be the pensioner of my friends or my acquaintances. No self-respectful man or woman wants to be entirely dependent upon others. We want, in however humble a way, to feel that they need us, and that we can do some little thing for them. Princely givers who do everything for us are not the men and women who win our deepest love and devotion, and who do us the most good. We like to do something for the great man, if it is only warming his slippers or helping him on with his coat, or running his errands; and we like to do it, not because he graciously permits it, but because we feel he really wants it, because our little services are needed by him, and he is partly dependent upon us. And this which we feel in relation to some man or woman whom we greatly love, is equally true of our own conduct to others. It ought not to be our ideal to do everything for others, to be self-sufficient, independent beings: that was not the wish or aim of Christ's life and should not be the aim of ours. He gave indeed out of the treasures of his love and faith unweariedly: he sacrificed himself for men, sacrificed his ambition, and his rest, and the opportunities for a quiet and pleasant life in order to make men's lives richer, purer, and stronger. But that is not the whole of the story. He made claims on his disciples and his friends, he called for help from them, he showed himself dependent upon them for love and sympathy and little services in a hundred ways. And this dependence of Jesus upon others endeared him to them, and strengthened and cheered them quite as much as his own power of helping. To feel that we are credited with the possession of some strength, that we are needed, that we are not the mere recipients of a bountiful charity, this calls out our self-respect and brings joy and courage into our lives. To call out this self-respect, this joy and courage, ought to be quite as much our aim in relation to our friends as to lay gifts at their feet and devote ourselves to their service. A friend often helps us more when he asks our help than when he offers his.

Think of the times when we are heavy laden, sorrowful, perplexed, disappointed. My friend comes to me and gives me of his sympathy, shares my sorrow, is perplexed and pained and unhappy because I am all these things. He gives himself to me, speaks out of his faith in God and love for me, words which soothe and strengthen me; he does little services, and is ready if he could find the way to make any sacrifice of time and thought to cheer and comfort me. It is a great service; in all times of grief and trouble such a friend is one to thank God for with all our hearts. The sympathy of those who love us, however powerless it may be, however little it may be able to alter the stern facts of death, or pain, or disappointment is yet one of the greatest blessings of life. But our friends can do more for us than any giving. That friend does most for me in pain and sorrow who not merely gives his sympathy and services, but in some way asks for mine. He who can awaken me to the sense that there are still countless duties calling me, he who appeals to me even in my weakness for some little help that I can give, he who comes asking a cup of cold water from my trembling hands, does more to re-animate my life than any mere giving could accomplish.

Think again of the closest and most common form of human relationship, the relationship of man and woman in marriage. We all know that true marriage means dependence upon one another in a thousand ways. That wife is the happiest whose husband wants her sympathy and advice continually; that husband is happiest whose wife wants his help at every turn. The man who stands alone, self-contained, strong and independent, who never talks about his day's work, treating his wife as outside the serious purpose of his life, does not know what marriage means. He may earn money for his wife, may be kind and considerate and generous, but if he does not ask her help and make many claims upon her sympathy he is treating her as a playmate, not a helpmeet, for him. And it is exactly as true in the case of the wife. That woman who manages her house and her children, who performs her social duties leaving her husband outside them, does not know the true happiness of marriage. She may make home very comfortable, she may be the best of managers and mothers, she may be exemplary in every way, better than the best of housekeepers, but unless she claims her husband's sympathy and help in many ways she fails in the most essential of all her duties.

This claim for sympathy does not consist in what I may call airing our worries to one another at home. Complaints to a hard-worked husband about the servants, or to a hard-worked wife about the way the world has used us, may be simply idle, irritable talk, not seeking advice or comfort, but only increasing the area of unhappiness; no sign of confidence or love, but only of a careless familiarity. But that a husband should tell his cares and a wife her trouble each to the other, believing in the power of the other to soothe and sympathise, appealing for help and love, and knowing they will find it, that is the attitude which makes the ideal home and brings peace and joy and a sense of security into our lives. It is a great happiness for any man to be able to say, no matter what happens, I shall find someone to help and to soothe me at home: but it is an even greater happiness to be able to say, no matter what happens, however weak and stupid and despised I may be outside, however great a failure, I shall find someone at home who wants me, who believes in me, who needs my comfort, and leans upon my strength.

This fact, which is pre-eminently true in marriage, is true in various forms in all the relations of our life. Many an unkindly prejudice against us can be done away by claiming some little service from the man who feels dislike for us. Human nature is so constituted that we begin to love those whom we have begun to help. An honourable man will often refuse a gift from one whom he dislikes, when he would be quite ready to give something himself of which he feels the other is in need. Indeed, a forgiving nature is shown much more clearly by being willing to receive a benefit from one who has injured us than by being willing to confer one. We can all feel a kind of savage delight in heaping coals of fire upon the head of our enemy: in giving him money or saving him from death, and if he is an honourable man he hates our benefits all the time and suffers exquisite torture from our gifts. But to receive benefits from one who has injured us, to allow him to help us in any way, or more still to appeal to him for some little kindness, and give him the satisfaction of partially redeeming his offence, that, I think, is the mark of the most forgiving, Christ-like spirit. I am not speaking, of course, of mean, greedy, degraded men, who will take anything from anybody, and who would rejoice in gifts from their enemies, and would hate them all the more: and I am not meaning that this action of asking help from those who dislike us ought to be created into a scheme, a clever trick for working upon hostile feelings which are a disadvantage to us. As a scheme, consciously adopted, such a method would hopelessly fail, and deserve to fail. It would be utterly unworthy of any self-respecting man. But I mean where such action, as in the case of the noblest men, is not adopted but comes forth spontaneously from the heart, it is the most effective means of overcoming enmity and the most perfect example of a Christ-like gentleness and love.

If a man whom I have injured or whom I dislike, and who knows it, trusts himself to me, claims my pity or my help, and does me the honour of believing I shall help him if I can, he has effected more towards breaking down my ill-will than he could effect by many gifts. This principle is equally true in Mission or Sunday-school work, and in our dealing with any who are weaker or more ignorant than ourselves. We do not adequately help even a little child by simply giving him some of our knowledge, and our strength, by defending him from temptation, and standing between him and trouble. It is the greatest compliment we can pay a child, and the greatest inducement for exertion, to make him feel we need him and lean on him for something. This does not mean using anyone as an instrument to save us trouble, selfishly employing our power over others to make them do our work. It means making even the weakest and most ignorant feel that there is something they can do for us, something by which they will earn our gratitude and respect, something for which we rely upon their character and strength. I do not say there is too much doing good, too much conferring of benefits by the rich on the poor, the wise on the foolish, the strong on the weak. But if the rich man goes to the poor simply to give he will gain no affection and do little good. He must go humbly, making the poor man feel that he too can give something in return. The wise man who wants to cram me with his knowledge, the strong man who wants to carry me across every obstacle, becomes intolerable. We ought to claim from others, even the worst, that they should do good: they do not exist simply to have good done to them. We ought to make them feel we expect that they can confer benefits as well as we, to teach the most ignorant that he has some knowledge which we value, and the weak that he has some strength which God needs. This is to sow the seeds of self-respect, to give pleasure and hope in life to those who feel themselves failures, and to call out his best from every child of God. That "give me to drink," addressed by a strong man to a woman, by a Jew to a Samaritan, is a mark of the gentlest and wisest chivalry. She would have taken no cup of cold water at his hands, would have probably rejected it with scorn, but was moved to a friendly feeling and a willingness to ask help, by finding that he was willing and anxious to receive a kindness from her. That principle holds in all the relationships of life, and is potent to break down the prejudices of classes and of nations. To give men the sense that we respect them and need their help and sympathy is the greatest gift we can bestow. This more than any other single quality constituted the attractiveness and power of Jesus Christ.

THE best perfection of a religious man is to do common things in a perfect manner. A constant fidelity in small things is a great and heroic virtue.—St. Buenaventura.

HISTORY is something more than a collection of a few spick-and-span facts that fit easily into a theory. It deals with facts as they are, in a state of nature. They are stubborn, unkempt, cross-grained, contradictory, obstreperous. They are a lot of unruly urchins who would like nothing better than to pitch schoolmaster philosophy out of the window; and, what is more, they have done it more than once. The function of history is not to confirm our preconceived philosophical views, but to chasten our philosophy and to rebuke it when it puts on airs of infallibility.—Samuel M. Crothers.

A TALK ABOUT TENNYSON.

THREE things strike me in contemplating the Life of Tennyson. First of all: he attended to his own work. He was assiduous in attending to it. He would let nothing draw him aside from it. For a dozen years or more in his early manhood he was, no doubt, uncertain as to what his work in life was; but when once he found it out he gave himself entirely to it, and for fifty to sixty years he devoted all that he was to it. There are many instances in our modern days of men of letters and science, like Carlyle and Emerson and Darwin, giving themselves and their whole lives up with a splendid devotion to their work, come praise, come blame, come pay or come poverty, but I do not know one single modern instance to equal the entireness of attention which Alfred Tennyson, come sneers and criticism or appreciation and success, gave to the work to which undoubtedly he was called. Emerson wrote down in his own diary, when he found himself misunderstood and reproached: "To every reproach I know but one answer—namely, to go again to my own work. 'But you neglect your relations!' 'Yes, too true; then I will work the harder.' 'But you have no genius.' 'Yes, then I will work the harder.' 'But you have no virtues.' 'Yes, then I will work the harder.' 'But you have detached yourself and acquired the aversion of all decent people; you must regain some position and relation.' 'Yes, I will work the harder.'"

So wrote Emerson in his private diary. And such evidently was exactly the spirit of Tennyson in his single, steady, unswerving devotion to his work.

The second thing that strikes me is the toilsome perfecting of his work. Not only was he a worker, he was thorough, always improving; willing to learn from his bitterest critics; amending all real weaknesses which their scrutinising eyes could point out and prove; never in a hurry to give the world his work; anxious more to do good work than to win either praise or gold;—slow, thorough, improving, good, and perfect work—these are characteristic of Tennyson.

It is safe to say that there is not in the English language, or in any language, a body of more perfectly finished work than is contained in the poems of Tennyson, and the hand of the Master which we behold in the works of his prime we also easily discern in the poems of his 'prentice years. But the improvements continually effected were immense. Honest self-criticism and gradual toilsome perfecting were always at work in the man. Moreover, Tennyson had a saving sense of humour, and when a man can occasionally look at himself as his enemies or critics do, and laugh at himself a bit, he is likely to be saved from many of his faults. In the thirties and forties of this century critics and reviewers were wonderfully plain spoken. There is a myth which says the reviewers killed John Keats—that is, caused his death by their ridicule of his poetry. It is true they were savage with Byron. And of Tennyson, one of these reviewers—namely, Christopher North, of the Blackwood's Magazine—in a long article, containing a certain amount of appreciation yet referring to one of Tennyson's early poems entitled "The Owl," wrote:—"Alfred himself is the greatest owl; all he wants is to be shot, stuffed, and stuck in a glass case, to be made immortal in a museum." This was severe; but Alfred profited by it. He took that same book of poems which "Crusty Christopher" thus criticised, and for nine years the world scarcely knew what Tennyson was doing. He made no sign. But during those nine years he so toiled and schooled himself and his talent that when his next book was published containing "Locksley Hall," "Dora," "Morte D'Arthur," "The Gardener's Daughter," "The Talking Oak," "The Two Voices," and "The Vision of Sin," Tennyson was at once acclaimed, in the language of Wordsworth, as decidedly the first of our living poets. Along with the book containing the poems I have just named he republished the book which Christopher North had so mercilessly criticised, but many of the poems in that earliest volume were suppressed for ever, and those which saw the light again were so altered and improved that if I could stay to give you samples of the originals and the perfected, you would see ample proof of the point which we are considering—namely, Tennyson's toilsome, patient effort to turn out perfect work.

But I pass to the third thing which has struck me in contemplating his life. I mean this: the enormous influence that a life of thought may be. Tennyson was not a man of action. He practically took no part in the affairs of our social, political, or national life. He lived a retired life of thought—of intellectual and artistic creation. Comparatively few people ever saw him. In 1880 he refused to be nominated Lord Rector of Glasgow University on the ground that he was unwilling to be "a party candidate for the Conservative Club." When made Lord Tennyson he was bound once at least to attend the Upper House, which he did, and gave the only vote he ever gave in Parliament, which was a vote in favour of the extension of the franchise.

Of course, men of action we must have: organisers, accomplishers of aims and purposes. And men of action we have in England in abundance. England could ill do—could not do—without them. But are we not apt to imagine that these men of action are the everybodies: that men of thought—who live apart—are nobodies—decent, quiet, harmless people, but dreamers you know—of no practical use to the world?

Now, is this true? Take Tennyson's life—has he left the world as he found it? He may not have added to the meat, and clothes, and shelter, and outward conveniences of life; but is the life of England—its real life—which consists of its ideas, feelings, ideals and determinations—what it would have been had Tennyson never lived? No, anything but that! I question whether any statesman ever has so altered, enlarged, and enriched our English life as this poet has, who lived apart and took no active share in public affairs. And for this reason: every action is first an idea; all that takes place in the outward world took place first in the inward mind. And it is because of this that these thinkers, these men of mind, these Martinis and Darwins, and Shakespeares and Tennysons—"men of books," if you like—exert such an enormous influence upon the world. In other words: it is ideas and feelings and thoughts and sentiments that sway and shape the world, and these are the men whose ideas feed us, whose ardour fires us with all that makes us men. Channing wanders in thought on the beach of Rhode Island, or sits in his study putting pen to paper, and thousands of minds are convinced, thousands of hearts are moved, and soon thousands upon thousands of hands and heads are busy to emancipate four and a-half millions of slaves. Darwin for twenty years observes Nature quietly and keenly on his estate in Kent, and scarcely ever leaves home; puts down his ideas in writing and changes the thought of the world. Tennyson abides in beautiful solitude—save for the sweet social life of his family—thinks his thought, writes his word, year after year for a whole full life-time, and see what he did for us. Well might Pestalozzi exclaim: "What a power, what a power is one human life!" J. J. WRIGHT.

SOUTHEND SEASIDE HOME.

THERE was a good attendance of friends of the new Southend Seaside Home last Saturday afternoon, when the formal opening by Lady O'Hagan took place. Among those present were Mr. I. M. Wade, always to the fore in good works connected with Sunday-schools, the Rev. E. J. Harry of Chelmsford, and the officials of the London Sunday-school Society. A good proportion of Southend friends were present besides visitors from London and other parts. After an opening hymn Mr. Frederick W. Lawrence, President, emphasised the importance of such homes as a means of supplying bodily health, and through this contributing to the spiritual well-being of those who were able to avail themselves of them. Mrs. Bayle Bernard then formally presented the documents conveying the gift of the Home to the London Sunday School Society, and Lady O'Hagan gracefully acknowledged the gift, expressing strong sympathy with the objects of the Home, and hoping that the movement might spread, not by the enlarging of that particular Home, but by the establishment of many small Homes in different parts of the country.

Mr. Wade proposed a hearty vote of thanks to Mrs. Bayle Bernard for her generous gift; and this was seconded by Mr. Talbot, of Highgate, who had been the first with his Sunday Class to occupy the Home, and who spoke in warm appreciation of its benefits and influence. Mr. Ion Pritchard, hon. treasurer, made a short financial statement, and said Mrs. Bayle Bernard's thoughtful gift had solved a problem which had frequently confronted the society—namely, the provision of some place of holiday resort for those teachers whose occupations and limited means often prevented their enjoying the rest which others more fortunately placed could secure. Mr. Harold Wade proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Savage Cooper, who had acted as hon. solicitor in the conveyance of the property, to the Southend friends, to Lady O'Hagan, and to Miss M. Pritchard and the other members of the Holiday Home Committee. Then the meeting, which had been held at the Unitarian Church Hall, adjourned to "Bernard Cottage"—the name of the Home—where Lady O'Hagan performed the ceremony of the formal opening. A social tea followed, arranged by Miss M. Cooper. Particulars as to the Home are advertised in our issue this week.

THE INWARD LIFE.

(From "Psalms of the West.")

WHY do the people go forth to wound, and their armies find cause for bloodshedding? why do they spend their living for death and their substance for destruction?

Wherefore should the children of God seek madness, and hastily rush unbidden into regions unknown?

Are their thoughts for ever at variance? can their wishes never be clear to each other in friendly communing, and must both be defeated by evil?

Is the sword a true judge, and the bullet a worthy tribunal?

Must all the wisdom of man, and the learning of ages and religion and sympathy be less than the argument of beasts?

Shall the love of martyrs not be remembered in the world, or the cruelty of oppressors be forsworn?

Doth not God himself suffer that we may perceive, and endure the agony that we may dwell in loving kindness?

How many have been his warriors who have groaned in torment and buried their mighty hearts in consuming dungeons, that after-generations might be free!

They have left all to serve our peace, to enlighten the dark valley through which they passed.

Yea, many have laid down their lives to save a sick child, and healers of man's trouble have arisen to bless all nations.

The true man is akin to all the righteous, and wisdom is alike in every tongue;

Surely the good desire the good of all, and the patriot seeth hope under every star;

How then can a king hire death for his helper, and build his throne on the woes of the innocent?

Are there no judges in the world whose conscience betrayeth not, whose honour is true as their equity?

Awake, all ye lands, and proclaim your obedience to your faith; make your gospel a power indeed!

Cast away your schemes of attack, and let freedom cause violence to die upon the world.

Turn your hatred against the principalities of evil, and forge your weapons for a war of salvation.

Pour your learning on the homes of the multitude, and defend them from every ill.

Let your battalions be drilled for health, and your arsenal be stores of knowledge;

Let your forts be turned into gardens, let your proud artillery tell forth with mirth the dissolving of armies.

The cannon of nations shall thunder in unison, they shall herald the breaking of the ancient yoke, the rising of a new goodwill.

Let your camping-grounds yield their veterans to the whole earth's service, let your recruits return to their harvests;

Let mankind unite in the strife of ages, and make glorious the earth whereon he dwells.

We know not the fulness of the beauty of harmony; let God govern the world, and the spirit of doubtfulness shall be changed to adoration and praise.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Sheep.

You have all, I am sure, seen a flock of sheep being driven, and you know how often one sheep takes fright at something and jumps through a gap or over a wall; and then all the others follow, apparently without any thought except that their companion went. We stand by and look on, and say what silly things they are; but we are wonderfully like them. We think how much wiser we are than they; and so we are or ought to be; but see how if someone wears a particular bonnet or dress, everyone else wears the same—not because it is specially pretty or convenient, but because it is the fashion.

As long as there have been sheep they have always been running after each other; and the writer of the Book of Isaiah saw how very much people did like sheep, for he says, "All we like sheep have gone astray," so that that resemblance is also a very old one. And is it not true? Girls and boys who go to school know very well how there is often one child who "goes astray" and does something wrong, and then many others follow. Many a wrong thing is done without any reason better than that Mary or Jack did it. That is, Mary or Jack jumped the wall where they should not go, and then the "silly sheep" did the same, and followed. That is all very well for sheep, but it is not a worthy reason for a sensible girl or boy. They have sense of their own, and can judge what they should do as well as Mary or Jack. Is it not a disgrace that sensible intelligent men and women and boys and girls should have so little strength of character as not to be able to stand against the stream, and that they should "go astray" simply because others do?

Boys begin to smoke—though they know that their parents would not wish it, and sometimes have forbidden it: they do not do it because they like it, for at first they usually find it horrible, but because other boys do it, and they think it manly, and they might be laughed at if they didn't. But such laughter would do them no harm, and only proves the boys who laugh and tease to be foolish, thoughtless, and unkind. And with regard to manliness, does it never occur to you that it shows much more manliness to refuse to join the other "sheep," and to bear to be laughed at, than to join the multitude and run with the flock?

Often this weak tendency to follow others, like sheep, brings people into terrible trouble. There was a fire in a theatre some years ago, and people began to rush to the door and staircase. On the stairs was a door that opened only upwards, but they were in too great a hurry and panic to see this, and the crowd from above rushed upon the door and jammed it so by their weight that it could not be opened. As more and more people rushed down the staircase, they became crushed and piled up against the shut door, and trampled down by those who came after, who in their turn were unable to help it, being forced onwards by those above them. Thus escape was impossible and numbers were killed.

How often, too, in a shipwreck, a rush is made for the boats—which are often sunk in the scramble and crush. Whenever in an accident or disaster there is a panic and rush, we may be sure that terrible consequences will follow. The poor sheep when they rush do it from some vague terror or alarm, and follow where they see others go. People, when they rush, have also the terror, but they have also a conscience, and, unlike the sheep, if they yield to the temptation to save themselves at all risks, they are guilty, because they are selfish. If even one person in such a disaster held back and tried to keep others back, there would be found at least a few to stay with him, and in patience possess their souls in the midst of terror, that they might not increase the danger. In a battle, one brave man may hold a whole multitude in check, though if he turned and fled they might follow; and though they may be killed around him, they fall covered with honour instead of disgrace, and with the name of heroes in place of cravens. If we see a girl or boy who stands firm against temptation, or abuse, or ridicule, who can say "No," and firmly do what he knows to be best; who can face danger and not run away, or who can put another in his place rather than save himself, that is the companion to follow.

I wish the crowds were oftener found to run with the brave and good! But we are so weak! All we like sheep have gone astray. Why do so many follow the weak and foolish? Why do girls pinch their waists, when God has made them the proper size? Why do boys smoke, when God has given them pure air which will nourish them instead of stunting them and spoiling their teeth—to say nothing of their manners? Why do we all do a hundred things that are weak and foolish and wrong, when we might do all the things that are brave and sensible and right? It is all weakness, children. We say that the sheep are "silly," but they are nothing to compare with us in silliness: for we know better and they do not. "If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness."

Do you know Miss Edgeworth's story of "Tarleton"? If you do not, try and get it to read. It will show you how one boy who liked to be popular got into trouble by not having courage to say "No," and how he became more and more deeply involved in wickedness amongst his companions, though he was not at all a wicked boy, simply because he was weak; and how a fine strong boy helped him out of it by his example.

Let us not therefore throw stones at the poor sheep and call them silly. "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone."

"Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honourable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things."

ON TRIAL.

WE believe that good judges of military affairs have warned our statesmen not to under-rate the task involved in such a war as is threatened in South Africa. It is no horde of savages, inadequately armed, that our forces would have to deal with, but a race of peculiar toughness, possessed of modern weapons, and, moreover, certain to fight with desperate courage in order to preserve if possible that freedom to which they passionately cling. In addition to military difficulties, it is certain that in the minds of expert politicians of all shades of party feeling there have arisen grave anxieties as to the legacies which such a war would leave behind it. If anything had been needed to emphasise the political perils of the war contemplated it has been amply supplied in the action of the Orange Free State. It cannot be doubted, even by the most foolhardy of Jingoists, that it is no light sentiment which has prompted the Free State to fling its destinies, if need be, into a struggle that can have but one end. And such sentiments, while they are the most intangible of forces, have a way of persisting with irresistible consequences from century to century. We believe our responsible governors are as a body fully alive to these political difficulties, and that it is largely owing to the vividness with which they perceive them that they have so long continued to negotiate rather than appeal to the sword. Between the ills we have and others that we know not of but all too clearly surmise our rulers have to choose. Not one word would any sensible man say or write that should tend to warp or confuse their minds in dealing with such a problem. Least of all should there be in their councils any appeal to passion, or prejudice, or party spirit. Let the daylight of reason pour upon the subject. For our part we should not only be satisfied with that: we should feel assured that the policy of this country would not in that case be such as to make Englishmen deeply regret it. The main facts are pretty well in the possession of anyone who has cared to examine the subject. The more they are studied the more difficult it must be to believe really that the future of South Africa would be a more prosperous one if the present difficulties were "settled" by war than if they were solved by reason.

The fact is our boasted civilisation, not to say our religion, is on its trial. We do not deny that the trial is severe; but what is it worth if it cannot stand a test? Last Sunday's scene in Trafalgar-square, and the horrible exultation with which some of our countrymen are bragging that at last we are going to "wipe out Majuba Hill," testify what forces of savage lawlessness and mere brutality are still stored up in our midst. The vicious spite with which those who plead for a peace policy are taunted as being "Boers" and "anti-British," betrays a disposition that is near akin to the wildest "fool-fury of the Seine." Consider also the persistent blindness, which surely cannot but be wilful in many cases, towards any aspect of the contest but that of "British interests," viewed in the narrowest light—a blindness which has strangely affected some good men and left them for the time being ranged with the merely predatory, the unscrupulous and the vengeful. What right have we at this end of the century to talk about liberty and humanity and progress, if we cannot set an example to Europe and the world worthy of our highest traditions? Any Power with guns enough can subdue its adversaries; is that all that England stands for? It is the oldest fashion among the nations to go out and kill people; but it is a barbaric fashion when all is said. There may be, nevertheless—someone will urge—hours when the primitive barbaric way justifies itself to the public conscience. Let it be so; but let those who urge it admit the evils wrought to the slowly developing civilisation of the world every time the appeal to arms is made. And then let them look closely at this case which is before us. If ever there were an odious form in which the invitation could come to a gallant and honourable nation to go and strike a blow for victory surely we see it now. It is not because the foe is a little one. He is large enough to be able to give a good deal of trouble; and even the least foe cannot depend on perpetual immunity despite all provocations. No; nor is it because the foe is peculiarly allied to ourselves, by race and traditions, political, social and religious, alike in Europe and in the Colonies. There is enough in these things to make us enter on the contest, if it must be, with grief and the utmost reluctance, rather than with the bombastic madness that has been so noisy of late. But the supreme odiousness of the case lies in the fact that to this foe we, as a nation acting through our honoured and trusted statesmen, deliberately pledged our faith that he should be free. Again and again the pledge has been given, and on the occasion of the Raid, the shame of which seems to have been marvellously soon forgotten—unless, indeed, it acts as a secret spring of vindictive feeling against him who suffered the wrong—the very Government which still remains in power showed by word and deed that it adhered to the pledge that had been given. And to-day the despatches of the Government reiterate the assurance that the freedom of the Transvaal Republic is not to be impaired. So decidedly, so solemnly, and so persistently our national faith has been pledged. It was surely the only honourable policy consistent with this pledge that, so far from trying to clutch all that could be squeezed out of the four corners of a legal document, a great and magnanimous people would have abstained from the very appearance of retreating from their word, even by so much as a hair's breadth. Unless we, as a people, feel this to be our duty in this case, what guarantee have we in the court of our own honour that we are a people worthy of self-respect, and not the mean, shuffling, tricky, grasping people that we pass for with some of our neighbours? Again, we say, sentiments, though most intangible, are wonderfully effective for good or ill; and if our nation does a mean thing now, or even colourably seems to do it, the shame that must attach to us even in our own eyes, cannot but impair our moral force and prepare us for a fall indeed. It will be said that the Boers should frankly accept the reiteration that we mean to deal honourably with them. We wish they would. We hope, almost against hope, that they will even yet be able to. And yet, if they do not, who is to blame? Who, if not those who from the hour that the Rand showed gold have been themselves showing a covetous spirit, defiant of all pledges, reckless of all honour? Who, but those who instead of feeling a chivalrous sympathy with men, however uncouth, who if they were called by our name would be extolled as patriotic heroes, have lost no opportunity of pouring contempt upon them? It is against the forces represented by these gamblers with a nation's reputation, and by the irresponsible crowds who think in their poor, ignorant way that, after all, it is slaughter and spoil that do exalt a nation, that the sober mind, and the truly patriotic mind of our people have at the moment to contend.

THE TRANSVAAL QUESTION.

SIR,—May I say one word on the letter—a rather amazing one from “an ardent and militant anti-militarist”—of my friend, the Rev. James Hocart, in your last issue?

Mr. Hocart says that Great Britain must be “feared,” because what at present restrains the nations “is simply the fear of one another.” This is neither more nor less than the creed of the savage. What the nations should desire is to be respected, and to deserve respect; and some nation must lead the way in scrupulous fair-dealing, or the creed of the savage will never be outgrown.

DENDY AGATE.

Altrincham, Sept. 25.

SIR,—Mr. Thompson, by this time, probably regrets the sending of his letter to you. Since he wrote, instruction has arrived. The highest legal authorities have given us the benefit of their interpretation of the documents, and they entirely bear me out. But the matter had no need to wait for authorities. The documents speak for themselves; and the responsible statesmen who drew them up, or who have acted upon them, never varied in their exposition of them. Everything shows with overwhelming clearness that the Convention of 1884 was not an amended Convention, but an entirely new one, modelled from first to last on entirely different lines.

By this time the matter is quite well understood, even in Board Schools, and it need not be pursued in THE INQUIRER.

J. PAGE HOPPS.

Croydon, Sept. 25.

SIR,—Having spent some years in South Africa, I take a great interest in the Transvaal question. I cannot look upon it as a mere party political matter, but as a question of international honour and justice.

You advance the only tenable position, that it should be settled “by the use, of weapons of reason.”

It is a question of interpreting one or two Conventions. The mind of your Cardiff correspondent seems much exercised about the relative value of the two documents. It would have been well if he had pointed out which of the thirty-three conditions of the first, or of the twenty conditions of the 1884 Convention, justifies our invasion of the Transvaal and cutting the throats of the old inhabitants, so that new-comers may reign in their stead.

Your Brussels' correspondent would justify such a course, he says, “because the Boers are incapable of properly working the land, and producing its mineral wealth.” He further says that their Government is “covetous,” though he evidently has a lurking idea that the gold is part of the land and belonging to the Republic.

Now, an invasion of the Transvaal would mean practically the annihilation of the Boers, for they are not mere hired soldiers, and would fight for the independence of their country with the last drop of their blood. When we fought them on previous occasions, as at Natal, they had some open country behind them into which they could “trek;” now they are surrounded on every side.

In the eye of the world, England's character for covetousness would not be excused on the plea that seizing the land and the gold and destroying the inhabitants was a necessity, for “if she were not feared she would be in serious jeopardy.”

Probably the seizure could be effected, for there is not much fear that the Boers would invade England unaided; but, as Mr. Russell writes, it would be a piece of national burglary with wholesale murder.

But the honour of England is bound up in the Conventions, which were intended to secure peace, and the first one asserts that the Boers were to have complete self-government; the second one, though having altered conditions and boundaries, was for the same purpose, on the understanding that the Boers entered into no foreign alliance. England was to use its suzerainty for the protection of their independence.

The people of England should rally to the support of the Prime Minister, and urge him to maintain the honour and dignity of the country, and not allow its power to be abused for cruel and covetous purposes, and curb its diplomatists from inventing excuses for an uncalled-for war.

If the Conventions be once broken by an invasion of the Transvaal, the Boers will be free to call for the intervention of the many eager military Eagles that are eyeing the Golden Carcass, who inspire Mr. Hocart's Gospels, and who are longing for England to blow the war trumpet.

STEPHEN S. TAYLER.

Brixton, Sept. 23.

Now we can understand the “authority” of Jesus. As he called men to purity of heart and rightness of life, to faith in the Fatherhood and love of the Brotherhood, the outward voice awoke the inward voice of reason and conscience. It was the voice of the Universal Soul resounding in the depths of the individual soul. Each man, like the prodigal, “came to himself,”—his real self,—knew his own mind, and felt as never before the greatness of his nature and his need of his duty and his privilege. The man before him was a spiritual looking-glass.—C. G. Ames.

OUR friends the Broad Churchmen like to appeal to what they term “the Christian consciousness”; the trouble with a certain kind of church history is that it deals exclusively with the Christian unconsciousness. One would not imagine that the old body of divinity ever had a soul. But let us take that idea of the Christian consciousness. The history of Christianity becomes the history of the gradual awakening to great spiritual facts, ideals, and duties—and still we are only half awake.—Samuel M. Crothers.

OBITUARY.

THE LATE MR. BENJAMIN HEAPE, J.P.

WE last week recorded the death of Mr. Benjamin Heape, J.P., at his residence, Northwood, Prestwich, Manchester, on the 16th inst., in his eighty-third year. He was born at Rochdale, and was a younger son of Mr. Benjamin Heape, who, during the first half of the present century, played a conspicuous part in public affairs, and was one of the leading spirits of Unitarianism, in Rochdale. In his early days the subject of our notice taught in the Blackwater-street Sunday-school, and began his business life in a cotton-spinning mill at Vicar's Moss. He left Rochdale sixty years ago, and established himself as a merchant and shipper in Melbourne, Australia. After a successful business career, during which he became a magistrate for the city, as well as for the territory of Victoria, he retired from business, and, returning to England, settled at Prestwich in 1856, where he spent the rest of his life. Mr. Heape was for a time a member of the Prestwich Board of Guardians, and also of the Local Board, and he was a justice of the peace for the county. He was a director and also vice-chairman of the Union Bank of Manchester. Until late years he was a trustee of both the Blackwater-street and Clover-street Unitarian Chapels, of Taylor's Charity (associated with the Blackwater-street Chapel), in Rochdale; also of Heywood Unitarian Chapel, Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and Stand Chapel, of the Memorial Hall, Manchester, and, until about three years ago, of the Rawdon Fund, Liverpool. It is interesting to recall the fact that he was one of the original members of the old Rochdale Literary and Philosophical Society, which is remembered now chiefly for the prominent part that John Bright took in its proceedings. The society was founded in 1833, and for four years before leaving England Mr. Heape acted as its treasurer. For a number of years he was on the Committee of the Manchester Domestic Mission, and took a keen interest in its work. As recently as May last he celebrated his golden wedding, having, in 1849, married his second cousin, Mary, the daughter of Mr. Joshua Heap, of Liverpool. He is survived by his widow, three sons, and two daughters. At the time of his decease he was a member of Stand Chapel, under the ministry of the Rev. R. T. Herford, B.A.

His mortal remains were deposited in the family vault at Rochdale Cemetery, on Wednesday, Sept. 20, the service being conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., of Moss Side, a nephew by marriage. During the course of an address, Mr. Roper made the following personal reference:—

We think of our departed friend to-day, whom we shall no more see in the flesh, but who will nevertheless abide with us as an influence for good in our lives all our days. We thank God that we knew him, and knew something of his integrity, something of the spirituality of his life, and of his deep sense of justice. One does not often meet with a man in his eighty-third year, so receptive of newer truth, so little wrapped round with intellectual prejudices, as the late Mr. Heape was. In quiet talks with him I found that he did not unwisely profess to know the details of the future life; but that the soul went on living, that it could not be annihilated, he had no shadow of doubt; and it could not be, either here or hereafter, anywhere where God was not; so there was nothing to be seriously troubled about, for it must always be in God's presence and in God's keeping. It was an inspiration to hear him talk about death, and about his own approaching end, with a calm resignation that indicated how he had thought out the problem of life for himself, and how his Christian faith had made his heart brave. When one learns that from his early youth his thoughts turned on religious themes, and that his letters written from abroad when quite a young man, were full of contemplative thought of a spiritual order, one can understand the serenity and trust of his old age, as well as the activity and generosity which always characterised him. One could not help being struck by his keen sense of justice. Everything must give way for that. A fair thing was a jewel; and justice came before generosity. Yet his generosity was a thing which could be relied upon when the cause that appealed to it was a worthy one. Staunch and true in his friendships, his memory will linger for ever in our hearts.

His companions and servants blessed him,
His home was the shelter of happiness,

Peace be upon him.

We saw him giving food to the hungry,
And clothing to the naked.

We saw him give help and succour to the aged,

And good counsel to the young.

Peace be upon him.

He did not give his alms before men that they might be seen of them. One had only to recount to him some tale of woe, and picture the need of a brother in distress, and he would voluntarily offer some practical help sympathetically and quite unostentatiously. If he never played any prominent part in the arena of politics or of general public questions, it was not because he was lacking in desire to benefit his fellows. One might give a long list of institutions in the work of which he actively and modestly shared; especially in connection with the religious faith he cherished and held most dear. He was a consistent and staunch Unitarian all his life, and when a young man he taught in the Sunday-school connected with Blackwater-street Church, Rochdale; and there is scarcely an organisation connected with Unitarianism which he has not served as a trustee or member of committee, and to the funds of which he has not contributed. But to know him best, in his old age at any rate, was to know him in his home, surrounded by those he loved. Bright, witty, full of sound, wholesome human nature; ready to furnish advice when asked for; seeing through everything and everybody with his flashing, sparkling, penetrating eyes; anxious to make everybody happy; and never so happy himself as when surrounded by happy friends; an affectionate husband, an honourable father and a sympathetic friend, he will be missed indeed. But time is inexorable. He had outlived most of his old friends, and then ripe in wisdom and in years, beloved and honoured by all who knew him, he approached the grave

Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

We shall cherish fondly the memory of our beloved friend; and surely, in God's providence, it will sanctify and purify our lives.

PULPIT REFERENCE.

Preaching at the Unitarian Church, Blackwater-street, on Sunday morning, the Rev. Thomas Carter referred to the death of the late Mr. Benjamin Heape, J.P. He said:—

Ere I proceed with my discourse I would recall your attention to the recent bereavement in a family connected with this church, a family we greatly esteem. Mr. Benjamin Heape of Northwood, in a ripe and honoured old age, has recently gone onward to join the Church invisible. During youth and early manhood he was intimately connected with our church, and later in life when he settled at Northwood, was an occasional visitor and worshipper here. Not many months ago he was with us at a special service. He was, I believe, your senior trustee, and he had, in truth, the welfare of our church and schools ever at heart. At all times when necessary he was a most liberal supporter of our cause.

Though not, perhaps, personally known to most of you, yet by those known he was much esteemed for his rare consistency, high integrity and free generosity. It was to him ever a delight to visit his native town, which he and other revered members of the Heape family have helped in the past to build up. We of this church can never forget the kindly, genial influence of his brother, more intimately associated with us, the late Mr. Robert Taylor Heape, and how much we owe to him.

It is no exaggeration to say that had it not been for the past generation of the Heape family, we should not have this beautiful fabric, as it is, to worship in. To their munificence, their influence, their untiring zeal and activity, this church, for the most part stands as a witness and memorial. We would here, friends, pay a silent homage to their memory and goodness. It is a satisfaction and inspiration that we have still worshipping here devoted and generous descendants of those worthy sires—long may the connection be continued. To them as your church committee very thoughtfully have done on your behalf to the nearest relations, we offer our warmest brotherly and sisterly sympathy. And may we, friends, one and all, in our degree, try in the same consistent and disinterested spirit to follow in the revered and honoured footsteps of the worthy departed. To equal them that may not be, to try to do so we may. God grant it and help us!

MRS. MARGARET BARRY, OF FOREST GATE.

WE have to record, with deep regret, the death on September 19, of Mrs. Margaret Barry, of Forest-gate, aged sixty-one years. Up to the time of her marriage she was a member, and taught in the Sunday-school of the Old Unitarian Meeting House, Glenarm. She married Robert Barry, son of Peter Barry, who was High Constable for the county of Down, and noted for his faithful attendance at Killinchy Unitarian Church, having never missed a Sunday (except when compelled through illness) for over fifty years. When her husband, Robert Barry, came to Belfast to commence business for himself, he joined the Second Congregation, Rosemary-street, and remaining a member until his death, Mrs. Barry continuing her membership which lasted for over thirty years. On her removal to London five years ago she joined Forest-gate, and was a member up to her death.

The funeral was conducted by the Rev. H. W. Perris, who, in his address, said:—

"To-day, we pay the last tribute of love to one who seemed more gifted for a world in which life and light were always uppermost; a child-like and happy spirit, in tune with all things bright and beautiful, easily content with simple duties and pleasures, at home with the young, but also sharing with quick susceptibility the cares and hopes of those to whom life's more strenuous tasks have been allotted. It was her happy fate to give love freely and ungrudgingly through all the years of her active service, and then to receive it as fully and freely again; thus the 'higher blessedness' was distributed, and she was a 'co-worker with God' in the training of hearts and lives for unselfish devotion to ideal aims. This was largely unconscious, no doubt; she did not much concern herself about the speculations and disputes of the Churches, or reach after very definite conceptions of religious truth and life; such natures as hers are a standing puzzle to theologians of every kind, and a manifest rebuke to all who vainly try to build up sects upon doctrinal foundations. She belonged to the countless host of women who toil and suffer in the place appointed for them, giving little heed to the controversies of Christendom, but accepting what has been called 'Mary's Gospel'; the simple faith that Love in heaven must be the sublime echo of love on earth, that God's heart must be tenderer and more grandly pitiful than man's, and that the Supreme Life from which came fatherhood and motherhood may be safely trusted to work out the salvation of its many sons and daughters. And that is the deepest note of religion; little else we can know for certain. The times and the seasons, the details of human progress and final destiny—these things are hidden and not revealed. What we and our children may know, and come to cherish as 'the master-light of all our seeing,' is that life is sacred because it is palpably sacrificial; and that the fine bond which grows up amid our common trials is the gold of our experience sevenfold refined; a reflex of that long-suffering patience which lies behind the veil of Nature, and is the core of the Divine purpose which links together Seen and Unseen, Life and Death, Pain and Joy, Time and Eternity, Earth and Heaven. So believing, how can we sorrow as those that have no hope, when we lay this dust which was the soul's tabernacle reverently aside?"

When what was once characteristic of the church becomes characteristic of the world; when what was once believed to be supernatural is seen to be natural; when what was once sacred becomes a familiar principle in secular life, then we have the triumph of religion. Men of action take up the ideals of men of thought and fulfill them.—Samuel M. Crothers.

THE AUSTRALIAN CHURCH.

SINCE my last letter, published in THE INQUIRER of May 6, the three "Australian Churches" of New South Wales have had a very welcome "visitation" from the Rev. Charles Strong, D.D., of the Australian Church in Melbourne. A sad family bereavement hindered Dr. Strong from fulfilling his Sunday engagement in Sydney, but he arrived for a week-night meeting on the Wednesday. At that meeting, attended by over two hundred persons, the Rev. Donald Fraser, M.A., of Newcastle, and the Rev. Matthew Walker, of Lucknow, were also present. Bright and encouraging addresses were delivered, and this first gathering upon one platform of our four ministers was not without its lesson and its promise for the future.

From Sydney Dr. Strong went on to Newcastle and Lucknow, where Sunday services and week-night meetings were held. Some controversy resulted, especially at Lucknow and Orange, where the "orthodox" forces came out strongly with misrepresentation and with ignorant abuse, which, however, did no harm to the Liberal cause.

We are now endeavouring to arrange another visit, in the event of which I shall probably take Dr. Strong's place, for a Sunday or two, in Melbourne. These fraternal gatherings are found to be very useful and very stimulating.

There is the prospect of a new "Australian Church" being established in Brisbane, Queensland; in which case it will be under the charge of an excellent man and a popular preacher who has just resigned his position as a Congregationalist minister. There is also some (as yet but vague) idea of having a minister-at-large, who would relieve the present occupants of pulpits occasionally, and at other times break new ground and perhaps establish new churches. The present outlook is full of promise. Dr. Strong has large congregations in Melbourne, and is doing about as much work, in various ways, as might engage the ordinary working time of three men. In Lucknow, despite some trouble at the mines, the Rev. Matthew Walker is more than holding his own. In Newcastle, the Rev. Donald Fraser, M.A., is doing good work and gathering large congregations on Sunday nights.

In Sydney, of which I naturally know most, we are making steady progress. At the recent quarterly meeting it was reported that the membership roll had increased from 107 to 120. Our morning congregations are improving, and in the evening we generally have about three hundred persons present. Last Sunday we had between four and five hundred. A Young People's Guild has been formed, and is steadily increasing its numbers. A Literary Society provides weekly meetings of a more advanced character, and monthly social evenings bring the members and friends together for conversation, games, &c.

We have been trying the experiment of arranging Saturday night lectures in the School of Arts Hall, and so far have had eight such meetings. Among the lecturers who have responded were Colonel G. W. Bell, the United States Consul, the Rev. Rabbi Landau of the Synagogue, Mr. Joseph Finney, B.A., Mr. Percival R. Waddy, LL.B., and others; while among those who have occasionally presided have been Mr. Justice Cohen, Mr. B. R. Wise, M.L.A., and Sir Joseph Abbott, the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly. All the meetings have been well attended, and sometimes the Hall was crowded.

Our Sunday services are now held in the Oddfellows' Temple, a large and cheerful building, which easily accommodates five hundred persons, and, on emergency, can be seated for about a thousand.

I am very pleased to have good news from my friends of the new Unitarian Church in Auckland, New Zealand. They are hoping soon to have an energetic young minister out from England. Such a man ought to succeed, and if he follows the best traditions of English and American Unitarianism he will succeed.

In the same issue of THE INQUIRER as that in which my last letter appeared, there was a report, by the Rev. R. H. Lambley, of his tour through Hobart, Auckland, and Sydney. In that report he says:—"The condition of our churches out here is not satisfactory." In a more recent issue (June 10) he writes:—"Within these last few weeks Australia has gained distinction by the creation of another sect. 'The Australian Churches,' four in number, have issued a 'basis of union.' The basis is broad and fairly tolerant." Such remarks are decidedly misleading to the friends of the Liberal faith in England, and to stigmatise as "another sect" a movement which is as far as possible unsectarian and progressive is somewhat more than merely ungenerous. That is precisely the spirit that has worked so much mischief to the cause of Unitarianism in the Australian Colonies, and so long as such an attitude is maintained "the condition of our Churches out here" will continue to be "not satisfactory."

So far as Dr. Strong and myself are concerned, I am free to say that we have desired to maintain most cordial relationships with the Rev. R. H. Lambley, and if this cannot be, it is certainly not our fault. Personally, I feel regret at my present severance from the Unitarian cause in Australia; but the "Australian Church" has raised an unsectarian banner, and has inaugurated a genuinely progressive movement, and I am glad to know that the cause is advancing.

During the last eleven months we in Sydney have maintained unbroken harmony; we have secured a membership that is still on the increase; we have done good work for freedom of thought; and, so far as I am concerned, I am proudly conscious of the thought that our work has been ethically and spiritually harmonious with the work being done by the Unitarian brethren in Great Britain and in America.

GEORGE WALTERS.

Sydney, N.S.W., July 31.

LONGING is God's heavenward will

With our poor earthward striving;

We quench it that we may be still

Content with merely living;

But would we learn that hearts' full scope

Which we are hourly wronging,

Our hearts must climb from hope to hope,

And realise our longing.

—J. R. Lowell.

FROM THE LAND OF THE WATTLE.

THE reports of the doings of our several churches and societies in England become ancient history before they reach us here, and any comment one might wish to make on some of the interesting points raised might seem to the readers of THE INQUIRER, in Europe, to have proceeded from pre-historic time. I will, therefore, only express the pleasure it is to us out here to read of your doings at home, and the splendid prospects of the London Bazaar makes us sigh in vain as yet for a like outburst of zeal.

One piece of news from "home" has a special interest and importance for us—namely, that the B. and F.U.A. has made a generous offer to the church at Auckland, which has been warmly and unanimously accepted. We are now waiting to learn who is to be the first minister of this promising "cause." Whoever he be, some warm welcomes await him in Australia, and our friends in New Zealand are preparing a "right royal welcome." They are doing more than that—arranging for him to begin his work under the most favourable conditions, in one of the best halls of the city, and in the most suitable neighbourhood. I have great expectations of Auckland.

Out here we are very dependent on good weather. We get so much sunshine that the temporary absence of it has quite a depressing effect. Sydney has had some bad weather and it has affected the Church there somewhat, but accounts are now again much more cheerful. The mention of Sydney reminds me that in THE INQUIRER of May 6 Mr. Walters gave one side of the unfortunate division and trouble in that Church. I have not said anything about this discussion, hitherto, and do so now with reluctance and only to correct, as far as may be, the misleading impression left by Mr. Walter's remarks. And first it is suggested, not explicitly stated, that the cause of his withdrawal from the Sydney Unitarian Church was a coming round to the opinion of Dr. Martineau, that the name "Unitarian" is not desirable as the badge of any society of "Liberal Christians." Mr. Walters may have "come round" to that opinion now, but there is no evidence to show that it was one of the motives of his action at the time; I believe in the first instance it was not even suggested. In the July number of the Liberal Faith, which he then edited, this passage occurred:—"I have more than once had to resist an effort to take the Sunday services out of my hands, and there is no earthly use in shirking the point that I would never consent to remain minister in any church where the conduct of the services was a divided function. No man with any self-respect would be minister of any church under such conditions. Perhaps there will be no special call upon the loyalty of my friends, but they may as well know that there are difficulties to be faced, and there is truth in the old saying, 'Forewarned is forearmed.'"

These words do not indicate that the resignation was due to any objection to the Unitarian name, nor any desire for a wider and freer field, but they do imply uneasy relations with all save some of his people. The "divided function" was, I am told, as to who should or should not sing the "sacred" solo at the evening service. I need say no more on that point. But Mr. Walters' fine distinction between "the Unitarian movement in Great Britain and in America," towards which his feelings remain "precisely as they were," and the same movement in Australia, towards which they have confessedly changed, strikes us here as an excess of refinement. We always thought we were one in aim, spirit, and ideal with the Unitarian and Free Churches the world over, but Mr. Walters would have the Unitarians of England believe otherwise. The insinuation is as false as it is ungenerous.

In Melbourne we have been giving ourselves up to decorating the interior of the church, which was very badly needed, as it has never been done since the present church was built, some thirteen years ago, and the result is very pleasing. We have also started a series of week-evening lectures in Prahran, a large residential suburb. One course has been given with satisfactory results, and a second begins next Monday night. These lectures ought to be a permanent feature of our work here, as a sure means of extending its usefulness and power.

As regards public questions, we are in for a big controversy as to the advisability or otherwise of introducing the Bible into the State schools. The motion has been before the Local Parliament, and for a time practically shelved by a motion which calls together the "heads" of the several denominations to draw up a series of Bible lessons that will be agreeable to all. Conceivably this might be done, if moderate counsels prevailed, but these are not likely to prevail in such an assembly, and the matter is regarded as hopeless. The Catholics are opposed to it. But the dissatisfaction with the present purely secular system is considerable, and the agitation will certainly be continued until matters are changed.

The question that has absorbed all others during these last few weeks is that of Federation. The vote has now been taken in four out of the six colonies, and carried in each of them. The majorities are, roughly: New South Wales, 24,000; South Australia, 47,000; Victoria, 143,000; and Tasmania, 12,000. The minority in New South Wales is large, upwards of 81,000, and may possibly cause some trouble yet, as further opposition is anticipated in the Upper House of that colony, but it is hoped some amicable way out of the difficulty will be found. This large minority is not as a whole opposed to Federation, but only to this particular Bill which has been submitted to the people. Some think the movement is premature and that the colonies are not prepared for it; and, perhaps, the fact that New South Wales loses, by Federation the advantage derived from free trade has swelled the adverse vote. In the other colonies the adverse vote is very small. These four colonies will constitute Federal Australia. Queensland and Western Australia may come in, but there is some doubt on the point which cannot be removed till the referendum has been taken. If Queensland stands out, it will not, as was once thought, entirely obviate the difficulty in the way of her coming in—namely, the "colour line," which means the employment of "coloured" labour in the tropical parts of the continent, more particularly in the sugar plantations of Queensland. It seems an imaginary line will have to be drawn, and south of that line blacks will not be allowed. The whole question is beset with great difficulties. These tropical regions can hardly be developed by "white" labour, yet the "whites" have strong opinions on the limitations that are to be imposed, partly on account of the wage question, and partly on account of their own supremacy in the continent. The point is accentuated just now by a rumour that a wealthy syndicate is prepared to take up large tracts in the north of South Australia, and work them with coloured labour. In any case this "colour line" is a rock ahead of Federation, but one may reasonably hope that it will be safely avoided and the whole continent become one commonwealth, than which nothing is more to be desired.

I fear I have glided into politics, but in no party sense. I thought these facts might have some little interest for some readers of THE INQUIRER; their importance for the religious as well as the material development of the lands cannot well be over-estimated.

R. H. LAMBLEY.

Melbourne, Aug. 2.

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSEMBLY.

THE 246th annual assembly of General Baptist Churches was held at St. Thomas's-street Chapel, Portsmouth, on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 18 and 19. The attendance at the public services was very satisfactory, and the gathering evidently excited some interest in the town. Among those present at some part of the proceedings were the Revs. W. Birks, T. Bond, J. A. Brinkworth, S. Burrows, W. C. Daland, D.D., C. A. Hoddinott, A. J. Marchant, W. J. Pond, G. Cosens Prior, W. Harvey Smith, E. Turland, J. Wain, J. Watmough, Messrs. H. Blessley, J. Keates, J. C. Pain, Mrs. Rogers, and Mrs. Timmins.

The Monday evening gathering commenced with an address of welcome by the retiring President (Mr. T. Bond), who concluded his remarks by introducing the new President, the Rev. S. Burrows, of Dover, who received a very warm reception. Having responded in felicitous terms to the welcome he had received, Mr. Burrows then gave his presidential address, in the course of which he dwelt on the free and open position of the churches connected with the Assembly. Belonging to such a group of churches, he sought to briefly set forth some of the characteristics required in the "Faith for To-day."

To discover these, said Mr. Burrows, we need to glance at the religious outlook at the close of the nineteenth century. It reveals a more complex condition in the religious world than perhaps has been present before in its history. What strikes us most forcibly is the prevalent religious indifference—too indifferent to either deny or affirm, content to "care for none of these things." Yet side by side with this is an energetic Neo-Catholic revival. The High Church school of thought is learned, devotional and doctrinal. Yet it is reviving old superstitions and curtailing individual liberty. In the Church of England the Evangelical school is but feeble to what it was twenty or thirty years ago. The Broad Church has dissolved into eminent individualities.

The Evangelical Dissenters may be roughly divided into Reactionaries, Moderates and Progressives. The Reactionaries seek to return to the theology of the Puritans; the Moderates desire to stay just where they are; and the Progressives are seeking to reconcile the fundamental doctrines of their position with the discoveries of science and the results of modern biblical criticism.

There are several signs that a change is going on. The interest in works on the Bible from the standpoint of the New Theology; the stir caused by the Ritschlian theology, which seeks to build up a scientific theology on the lines laid down by the mind of Christ and the Christian consciousness of the Church, all show that the thought of the Christian Church is undergoing a transformation. The Free Churches, unbound by any doctrinal trusts, are seeking a more spiritual and not less free interpretation of religion. Outside the Churches, Mr. Burrows glanced at the Secularists, and the Ethical Culturists, both of which he believed were clearing the ground for a higher religion.

The selfish pleasure-seeker also represented a large section of the population in our towns and cities. The question naturally arises, what faith have we, as a group of churches, to offer to the special needs, wants, and weaknesses of to-day? Attempting only to answer this from his own standpoint, it seemed to him that a new idea of the Bible was dawning on the Churches, and thoughtful men were perceiving that its literary criticism must be perfectly free, and spiritual things must be spiritually discerned. The rapid growth of the High Church school showed the need for more attention to be paid to devotion and doctrine. We must not be afraid of definite teaching if we are to win the indifferent. Mere sentimentalism will not win Secularists or Ethical Culturists to accept religion, they must have reason given them for belief. The great literatures of the devotional and speculative thought can help us, until we are able to fill the conclusions of reason and conscience with deep feeling and impassioned love. If in our own work some inquiring mind is helped, some tired and tried are soothed, some heart made happier, it will not be in vain. So trusting in God, seeking to follow Christ and help our fellow-men, let us strive to proclaim a faith that will meet the claims of heart and head, and practical daily life.

A Communion Service followed, presided over by the Rev. W. C. Daland, D.D., assisted by the Revs. J. Watmough, J. Wain, and E. Turland.

Tuesday morning was devoted to the business of the Assembly. The letters from the churches were read, and reports of the Committee and Messengers were presented, received and adopted. The Rev. W. C. Daland, D.D., was elected Vice-President for the year. The Treasurer and Secretary to the Assembly, also the Treasurer, Secretary, and Librarian to the Education Fund were re-elected, and the Committee was appointed. A resolution of indignation at the recent trial in France, expressing sympathy with the victim, his wife, and legal advisers was unanimously adopted. Fraternal greetings were forwarded by telegraph to Mr. G. Withall and the Rev. H. Solly, both of whom were prevented by age and infirmity from being present.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Divine Service was held on Tuesday evening, the devotional part being conducted by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, of Deptford, and the sermon delivered by the Rev. W. HARVEY SMITH, of Bethnal Green-road. The preacher based his remarks on Psalm 90, v. 16: "Let thy work appear unto thy servants and thy glory unto their children." In the course of his sermon he remarked that the glory of God was manifested in the perfecting of man, and this desirable condition could only be attained by man as the result of a sincere devotion to the higher life. The possession of "Life Eternal" was the great requirement, and was not so much a question of duration as of the growth and development of all that is high, noble and good, and a strong resistance to all that is degrading—or as it may be termed, "the survival of the fittest." Without the divine life immortality would be undesirable, for no one could desire the endless existence of much that characterised human life—its passion, avarice, lust, and false ambition. "And this is Life Eternal that they might know Thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent"—knowledge which can never be attained by abandonment to ease and luxury, but by a noble aspiration after all that is God-like and emulation of Jesus in a life of service and self-denial. What, asked the preacher, are the signs of the progress of Christianity in the life of to-day? Some there are who look upon the late Peace Conference as an entire failure, but to him it was a hopeful sign that it should be held at all, that men of influence, gathered from various nations, should take counsel with the object of minimizing if not of entirely abandoning the evils of our present system of dealing with international difficulties.

The cautious consideration given to the Transvaal question, marks a decided advance on former times when wars were rashly and hurriedly undertaken, and is an indication of the restraining influence of a powerful and improved public opinion. Many of us, said the preacher, have felt indignant at the result of the recent trial in France, but when did an act of injustice and cruelty evoke from thousands and tens of thousands so spontaneous an outburst of sympathy and so strong a protest against corruption—an evidence that a growing love of justice possesses the minds of the people. In conclusion, the preacher expressed the hope that though the churches of the Assembly were few and their following not large, they may seek to build up their people in the knowledge of the Life Eternal, and thus promote the welfare of man and the glory of God.

Cordial acknowledgments were made to the Portsmouth friends for their excellent reception and the admirable arrangements made for the comfort of the delegates.

WHEN we struggle for a larger liberty for the soul, we are members of a mighty host. We are comrades of Parker and Channing, of Milton, of Luther, of Paul, of the apostles and of the prophets. History is written and read because men of this type have lived. Who would read the monotonous annals of a dull and cowardly conformity? History follows the line of progress.—Samuel M. Crothers, Ainsworth.—The harvest festival and choir sermons were preached on Sunday, Sept. 24, by the Rev. Matthew Robert Scott, resident minister. Although it was a very wet day, the congregations were very large, and the collections on behalf of the choir amounted to £11 0s. 7d.

Belfast Domestic Mission.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, the 24th inst. The Rev. G. J. Slipper, pastor loci, officiated morning and evening. In the afternoon a special service was held, at which the pastor gave an address to the young people.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—Harvest services were held last Sunday, large congregations being present. Availing himself of a curious outburst of ignorant prejudice against Unitarians, the minister, the Rev. W. J. Davies, has given special discourses in defence of Unitarianism.

Billingshurst.—The anniversary was celebrated last Monday, the preacher being the Rev. E. M. Daplyn. At the brief meeting which followed addresses were given by the Revs. S. Burrows, E. L. Buckland, E. Turland, and J. J. Marten. The Rev. S. Pendred, Congregationalist minister at Billingshurst, was also present. Mr. Daplyn's sermon was an inspiring utterance, dealing with the development of moral ideas and the progress of humanity during the ages. Spite of the spirit of medievalism, which would hark back to the ages of darkness, and the spirit of despondency, which would at times paralyse the strongest will—aye, even despite the travesty of justice we had just witnessed in France, and the gold greed that might hurry England into an unjust war, we might still have faith in the future of our race.

Birmingham: Old Meeting.—Large congregations attended the harvest festival last Sunday. In the evening selections were given from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," the congregation joining in the chorales. The music was admirably rendered by an augmented choir. The Rev. Joseph Wood preached.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday last, Sept. 24. The "Seed Sower" has been localised by this church.

Bolton: Bank street.—For some considerable time past this congregation, at the suggestion of the senior minister, the Rev. C. J. Street, has had in contemplation the establishment of a mission station in one of the populous outskirts of the town. A committee was appointed and authorised by resolution of the congregation to endeavour to secure suitable premises in the vicinity of Halliwell-road. At last, after many difficulties, this has been found possible, and three cottages fronting on to the main road and one at the rear have been secured. The three cottages are to be transformed into a school-room, which will provide comfortable accommodation for over 150, and the other cottage will be used for class-rooms. An afternoon school and an evening service will be established to begin with, under the guidance of the Bank-street ministers, of whom the Rev. N. Auderton especially will give a good deal of his time and attention to this work. From the number of workers who have volunteered their services and of parents who have promised to send their children, as well as from the suitable nature of the locality, it is anticipated that before long a flourishing mission station will be established. The necessary alterations will be commenced in a short time, and the premises will probably be ready for occupation before the end of November. The cost of purchase and alterations is estimated at about £600, and the committee have resolved to appeal to the congregation to raise the whole amount before the end of the year.

Braiford.—On Sunday, harvest festival services were held in connection with Chapel-lane Chapel, and there were very large congregations. The preacher for the day was the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones M.A. An augmented choir gave excellent music.

Cairncastle.—A fine new Mason and Hamlin American organ was formally opened by a special service on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 17. There was a large congregation representative of all Protestant denominations in the district, and including many friends from Larne and elsewhere. The choir was augmented from the choir of the Old Presbyterian Church, Larne, the organist of which, Mr. Ernest Haywood, officiated on the occasion. The preacher was the Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, B.A., of Comber, who founded his address on the text "Praise him with stringed instruments and organs." He pointed out that as harmony comes from diversity, so the different sects of the Christian religion attuned to the common chord of glory to God, and the good of His creature, should produce a grander and nobler effect than if this diversity did not exist.

Capelybryn.—The annual harvest thanksgiving services were held on Wednesday evening, Sept. 20, when a sermon was delivered by the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul. The chapel was crowded by an interested and attentive congregation, and the collections, which were for the B. and F.U.A., were above the average.

Gillau Aeron and Rhydygwin.—Harvest services were held in these churches on Friday, Sept. 22, when the Rev. T. A. Thomas, Llandyssul, gave an appropriate discourse. The services were well attended, especially in the former place, where a collection was made for the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Gloucester.—On 17th inst. the harvest thanksgiving services were held. Miss Julia Austin presided at the organ, and there was hearty congregational singing of suitable hymns. On Sunday, the 24th, special sermons were preached on behalf of the Cottage Hospital, with collections.

Cullompton.—On Wednesday, 20th, a marriage was solemnised in our chapel between Mr. John Palk and Miss Minna Naomi Salway, late scholar in the Sunday-school, and both regular worshippers in our services. The Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, B.A., officiated in the presence of many interested spectators. This is the first marriage since 1876, and, in consequence, much interest was excited by the event. Formerly, the Unitarian chapel was the only dissenting place in Cullompton with a marriage licence, and marriages were of frequent occurrence. On Sunday, 24th, our Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated, Mr. F. H. Vaughan again officiating. In the morning and afternoon he spoke to the children, and in the evening to a crowded congregation preached on "The Duty and Responsibility of Parents."

Deal.—The congregation here presented their minister, the Rev. T. Shakspeare, with a pedestal lamp and book-rest on the occasion of his marriage, while Mrs. Shakspeare received a travelling clock from friends connected with her former places of worship, High-street, Portsmouth. In each case a letter expressive of good wishes accompanied the present.

Dewsbury: Resignation.—At a congregational meeting, held Sept. 24, the Rev. J. Boughey's resignation as pastor of Unity Church was accepted, the resignation to take effect Dec. 31, 1899.

Elland.—Harvest thanksgivings were celebrated here last Sunday week, the Rev. J. Boughey officiating. On the Tuesday evening, Professor Arden, an Armenian refugee, gave a thrilling lecture on his experiences.

Gateshead.—Harvest festival services were conducted on Sunday last by Mr. Thomas Paxton. There were good congregations at each service. On Monday a "social" and fruit banquet was held. Mr. H. Sutcliffe occupied the chair.

Guildford.—On Sunday last at the Ward-street Free Church, after a devotional service conducted by the minister, Mr. E. S. Lang Buckland, a lecture was delivered upon "Buddhism" by Mr. Alfred J. Robertson, an earnest exponent and a competent authority. The lecture, which was of a profoundly religious character, was listened to throughout with the gravest attention and the warmest appreciation. Mr. Robertson has lived in India, in China, in Egypt, and in Japan, and was therefore able to speak upon the subject with experience and actual personal observation as the basis of his reflections.

Hollywood, near Birmingham.—The harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday last, when special sermons were preached by the minister and appropriate music was given by the choir. The harvest gifts were afterwards distributed to those in need of help and the old and sick. The collections, amounting to over £4, were in aid of the benevolent fund.

London: Lewisham.—Thanksgiving services were held here last Sunday with large congregations. The Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope preached both morning and evening, and also addressed the children at the morning service. On Monday evening, Sept. 25, the Literary and Scientific Society entered upon its third year. Work has been outlined for six months with weekly meetings. This society commenced with forty members; last year there were fifty-five, and this year there will probably be a hundred.

Manchester: Bradford.—On Sunday, Sept. 17, the harvest festival services were held in the Public Hall. In the morning an address was given by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Accrington, on "Harvest Customs." At the evening service, the cantata, "Under the Palms," was well rendered by the choir, augmented. The new church is now in process of building, and it is hoped that before long it will be ready for occupation, as the work is sadly cramped for want of suitable and more commodious premises.

Manchester: Longsight.—Successful harvest services were held here on Sunday last. A musical service in the afternoon was very successful, a number of suitable anthems and choruses being rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. O. H. Heys, organist and choirmaster. The sermons were preached by the Rev. Wilfrid Harris, M.A., our minister, who also delivered an address in the afternoon. The church will be closed for beautifying for the next few weeks, during which time service will be held in the Gaskell Hall. There are also to be considerable alterations to the organ, the bazar held in March this year provides us with a sum to meet a considerable portion of the cost entailed. It may interest our friends to know that the whole of the outside of our church and school buildings have been painted, and the Gaskell Hall and class-rooms of the Sunday school redecorated. The reopening service in the church will take place on Tuesday, Oct. 31, when Dr. L. de Beaumont Klein will preach.

Nantwich.—The Rev. J. Morley Mills, preaching on Sunday evening on the Dreyfus case asked, did it not point out to them some of the evils that came of giving a military party unlimited power? Such a party could be actuated by no other policy than that of war. We had a military party in this country which had vast influence, at times almost overwhelming. Such a time was the present when our relations with the Transvaal Government were strained. On a matter upon which we should scarcely fight a general election this military party was leading us on to the very verge of war, which if it took place might possibly bring upon this country even more dishonour, loss and contempt than the "Affaire Dreyfus" had brought upon France. It was an instance of how the spirit of revenge when it took possession of a nation would so warp its judgment, prejudice its mind, and de-throne its conscience that it would stoop to take part in the meanest and most unprincipled actions, which were it free from that spirit of revenge it would scorn to entertain.

Plymouth.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, Sept. 24. A children's service was held in the afternoon. An address was given by Mr. Kelland. Collections were taken in aid of the Sunday-school, amounting to about £3.

Poole.—The harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, Sept. 17. The Rev. Stalworthy (Congregational minister, late of Poole) preached two excellent sermons. Good congregations attended morning and evening. Collections were taken in aid of the Church Fund.

Pudsey.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held here on Sunday last, Sept. 24. The minister, Rev. John G. Slater, preached morning and evening, and in the afternoon a service of song was given. On Monday evening a fruit party and social meeting was held.

BARTON-STREET CHAPEL,
GLOUCESTER.

BICENTENARY FUND.

A BAZAAR will be held on NOVEMBER 22nd and 23rd to provide a Fund for the extinction of the debt. The debt was incurred in 1893 by the Renovation of the Chapel, a new Heating Apparatus, Gas Fittings, &c., the cost being £760. The congregation, with the assistance of friends, raised £380, leaving a balance of £380, upon which interest amounting to nearly £100 has since been paid by the congregation. It is earnestly desired that the debt may be extinguished before the close of the year. The interest shown in the Bicentenary Commemoration in April last encourages the congregation to appeal to their friends for help.

Contributions of Money and Goods will be thankfully received by

Mrs. C. W. WASHBOURNE, Annandale, Weston-road;

Mrs. WALTER LLOYD, The Hollies, Brook-st.; Mr. JAMES WAREING, 138, Westgate street;

Bernard Cottage, 15, Hillcrest-road, Southend, is a small seven-roomed house, well placed on high ground, within ten minutes' walk of the sea. It will accommodate six guests, or even seven, if absolutely necessary; and Mrs. Gilbert, who has had experience in the mothering of some of the Country Holiday children for the last three years, is acting as housekeeper. It is intended that the "Home" shall be open all the year round.

PERSONS ELIGIBLE.

- Elder scholars above 13, accompanied, if possible, by a teacher.
- Sunday-school teachers, women connected with our Sunday-schools, mothers' meetings, &c.
- Friends connected with members of our congregations, and others approved by the officers appointed by the London Sunday School Society's Committee.

PAYMENT.

For classes a and b, 7s. weekly. For class c, 10s. to 15s., according to circumstances.
Fees to be paid in advance.

MODE OF ADMISSION.

Application to be made through the Sunday school delegate. The age and sex of applicants, the time when the visit is desired to be made, and the length of stay required, should be stated.

Local Hon. Secretary, R. EWART CRANE, Westmount Lodge, Heygate-avenue, Southend-on-Sea.

Superintendents and teachers are earnestly invited to make the existence and purpose of the Seaside Home known to their various schools and to the institutions connected therewith, bearing in mind the fact that the truest way of thanking Mrs. Bayle Bernard for her generous gift will be to make the best possible use of it.

HOME FOR HEALTH CULTURE, THE FIRS, BRONYARD, HEREFORDSHIRE.

This Home provides a course of Systematic Daily Exercise, combined with regular outdoor life and occupation, for Ladies and Children who are not in normal health. The exercises are given in a Gymnasium fitted with Swedish apparatus, and consist of Ling's Swedish Movements. Special treatment is given for Spinal Curvature, Anæmia, Hysteria, Indigestion, Neuralgia, &c.

For further particulars, apply to The Principal, Miss JESSIE BAKER (trained by Mme. Bergmon, Österberg).

THE BIBLE FOR HOME READING.

Edited with Comments and Reflections for the use of Jewish Parents and Children. By C. G. MONTEFIORE. Second Part. Containing Selections from the Wisdom Literature, the Prophets, and the Psalter, together with Extracts from the Apocrypha.

Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

British Weekly.—"Although primarily intended for the use of Jewish homes, Mr. Montefiore's edition of the Bible cannot fail to find its way into the hands of Christian parents. These will find in it much to instruct and much to edify. . . . If in some respects readers are likely to differ from his judgments, they will certainly recognise that this is a felicitous and instructive method of dealing with the Bible."

SALE UNITARIAN CHAPEL.

RE-BUILDING FUND.

The Committee of the Sale Unitarian Chapel desire to thank most heartily the many friends who have helped them to complete the Restoration of their Place of Worship by contributing to the above Fund. They regret, however, that they require to ask further help. The cost of re-building has considerably exceeded the original estimates, the amount spent being £2,924 10s. 7d. Towards that sum £2,665 8s. 1d. have been received, including £1,750 from the Insurance Company. Thus £915 have been subscribed by the congregation and friends. But £260 are still required, and the committee venture to make a final appeal to Unitarian friends to assist them to clear off the adverse balance. An interim balance sheet has been prepared, and copies will be sent to all subscribers. The long delay in its preparation has been caused through difficulties with the contractors, and this indeed has regrettably hindered the progress of the Fund. The Committee trust, however, that this unavoidable delay will not affect the response which they hope will be made to their appeal for final help.

Subscriptions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by—

CHAPEL LANE CHAPEL, BRADFORD.

A GRAND BAZAAR will be held in the CHANNING HALL, adjoining the Chapel, on OCTOBER 19th, 20th, and 21st, 1899, to raise £500 for the clearing off of the Debt on the New Schools, the purchase of a new Heating Apparatus, the Renovation of the Chapel, and other purposes.

The total cost of the scheme will be at least £2,000, towards which nearly £1,500 has already been raised.

The Bazaar will be opened on the three days respectively by Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, J.P., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the Right Hon. Lady O'HAGAN, and Sir JAMES KITSON, Bart., M.P.

Donations of Goods and Money will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the—

Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES, 18, Blenheim-road, Bradford (Minister);
Mr. BYRON BOOTHROYD, 37, Mannville-terrace, Bradford (Treasurer);
Miss HUDSON, 7, Blenheim-road, Bradford, and Mr. GATHORNE HARGREAVES, 24, Spring Cliffe, Bradford (Secretaries).

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE had hoped at the beginning of the present month to be free from the most pressing burden of anxiety in regard to the relations of this country with the Transvaal, and at the beginning of the season of the full winter's work to be able to turn undivided attention to the special interests of our churches. But national righteousness is the intimate concern of us all, and even now hope and despair seem to be evenly balanced, and we may have to bear the sorrow and dismay, which such a war, as seems to be impending, must bring. We are thankful to know that in our churches this anxiety is deeply felt. We are all alike burdened, though with differences of judgment as to the incidence of blame should the efforts for a peaceful solution of the difficulties ultimately fail. There is, we are convinced, among our people one common prayer for peace.

M. HOCART, of Brussels, writes in reply to Mr. Agate's note on his previous letter on the Transvaal Question, that he has been misunderstood. "What did I really say?" he asks. "That my ideal, therefore my creed, is the ideal of the Peace Society; but that I could not close my eyes to the patent fact that all European nations are distinctly militarist, armed to the teeth, and only restrained from war by the fear of one another. Is this a fact or not? I firmly believe it is. Therefore, the 'creed of the savage' is not my creed, but the creed of the European nations, and that is why I am an ardent anti-militarist. But if I am living among savages restrained only by fear, it is an imperative necessity for me to make myself feared, unless I wish to be killed, baked, and eaten, which I do not, not being a disciple of the doctrine of non-resistance. And it is for reasons of the same sort, i.e., for her self-preservation, that I think that England must make herself feared under present circumstances. Mr. Agate says: 'Respected, not feared.' I say: 'Respected and feared.'"

M. HOCART also sends us the text of a resolution which he submitted on Thursday week to a meeting gathered at the People's House, in Brussels, to protest against Great Britain's policy: "Considering that the appeal to brutal force is contrary to the principles of our modern civilisation, and that war is always disastrous to both of the belligerent parties, this meeting expresses the hope that the conflict between the British and the Transvaal Governments will end peacefully by the adoption of measures of conciliation safeguarding the undoubted rights of the Uitlanders, the independence of the Transvaal Republic, and the hegemony of Great Britain in South Africa." The meeting, however, which was very large, would only accept the first part of the resolution, down to "measures of conciliation," and replaced the rest by an expression of sympathy for the Boers and a denunciation of the crime Great Britain was preparing to commit. M. Hocart's attitude on this question has brought upon him a good deal of severe criticism, the leading Catholic paper in Brussels, le Patriote, for instance, calling him an enemy of the Boers, and adding: "Mr. Hocart has written a book to defend the Jews, but he is indifferent to the liberty of the Boers." He has been warned by trusted friends that he will alienate many Belgian and Dutch sympathisers with his work; but he is determined to hold upon his course, as advocate of justice to all parties.

MEMBERS and friends of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties will find in our London Letter this week some particulars as to the annual meeting of that Assembly, to be held at Wandsworth on Tuesday. At the service in the East-hill Chapel at 11.30, the Rev. Silas Farrington is to preach, and the subsequent meetings will be held in the Wandsworth Town Hall. Clapham Junction is the station for friends to arrive at from a distance. If they find it hideous they will all the more appreciate the cordial greetings and the stimulus and good fellowship of the Assembly.

There is a serious duty as well as pleasure to be considered in securing overflowing meetings on such an annual occasion.
